M'DONALD HAS SHADE OVER QUINLAN; FALES MURDERS HEN EZZELL

Sinbad the Sailor Deletes Johnny Grant in Semi Finals

Danny MacDonald won an eight-round Marathon from Tommy Quinlan, of Pittsburgh, at the Academy of Music last night. Quinlan heralded as a barecat, proved himself the Paddock of the ring. He started with a rush. He ran out of his corner at the tap of the first gong, and kept it up until the last. The only difference was that he started running at Danny and then changed to run from him. And he hit Wee Dan on that first rush. A regular man sized maul for a runt, but he never got close enough with his pudgy fist any more to do any damage. Danny caught him several times, but never kept in range for a sufficient length of time to inflict any severe punishment. Several times in passing on the laps, they eluded at each other, and in these brief exchanges, Quinlan proved that he has a punch of potentialities, but like the rattlesnake, he warns before striking. He flopped Mac on one knee with one of them in the fourth, and spilled claret from the local lad's snout in the sixth with another.

With these exceptions, however, the fighting was not seriously hostile. The rest was all Mac. In the preliminary, Henry Ezzell was knocked out in the fifth by young Fales after making three desperate attempts to hoist the white flag. His first effort in this direction caused the emblem of purity to get a saffron fringe, but Ezzell learned with time and beat the bell by four seconds the last time he waved the pallid pennon. Sinbad, the Pummelling Proofreader, earned a decision over Johnny Grant in the semi-finals, a four-round spasm. Sinbad started off like a fighter, then figured the Grant lad's seconds were poor with the plamleaf between rounds and started fanning Johnny. Grant hit the ex-gob several hefty punches during the interim Sinbad was dickering with the wrong foot, but the blue pencilling son of Neptune scored fairly well in the final sprint. Taking it all and all, 'twas a fairly good evening for the fans.
