wouldn't be.' He scanned the faces again. "I beg everyone's pardon, but the search must go on." Most of the guests laughed about it. A few were indignant. Linda knew that she was the target of curious eyes. She held her head higher and winked back the angry tears.

That ring was somewhere, planted by Mina, she believed. She half expected it to fall from her ruffles. When the search of the ship's quarters revealed nothing, the musicians began to play again. "Linda, you little goose, what made you pull such a boner" Ron-nie asked affectionately, drawing her outside. His arm was warm and comforting about her. Yet something was wrong. He wasn't an ardent lover. He was more like an indulgent brother. He should be prostrate with tenderness, or furiously angry. He ought to register a pretty good percentage of something important. "Mina's pretty wrought up about Robert. Terry is somebody on a string whom she uses to make him jealous, only Rob doesn't care, because he loves a girl named Billie
