Nurses Should Remember That Veterans Are Heroes

By RUTH MILLETT

In commenting on the shortage of nurses for work in Veterans hospitals Dr. Charles M. Girfith says: "The thing we've got to do is to make our American girls—trained and nearly trained nurses—realize that the veterans they will care for are not old men, but youths who only a short while ago were their next-door neighbors and schoolmates. I'm afraid many girls aren't interested in serving with this agency simply because they're afraid of that word veteran."

That is a lesson not only nurses need to learn—but all civilians. In our minds we must come to have the same kind of respect for the word veteran as we have for the word hero.

But our interest and sympathy shouldn't be founded on the fact that today's veterans are young. For they won't always be young. They'll grow old like the rest of us—only many of them will grow old in hospitals.

for our remembrances and honor of them won't grow less with the years—just because they are old veterans, rather than young ones. It will grow greater, as more and more of life passes them by.

"HEROES HOSPITALS"

The old veterans who aren't appealing in their need of nursing care to nurses today—the veterans the girls think of when they hear the word—were young men once, too. Not so many years ago they came out of war scarred and disabled, but touchingly young. They are old now—as today's young veterans will some day be old—but they are still heroes and should still be regarded as heroes.

It might even wake us up a little if we called the hospitals caring for discharged service men, suffering from wounds and illnesses, "Heroes Hospitals" instead of Veterans Hospitals. It would sound a note of present rather than of the past, and perhaps nurses would be more inclined to care for heroes than for veterans, of whatever age.

New York Style Show Nears End

By DOROTHY ROE

Associated Press Fashion Editor

NEW YORK, Jan. 11.—Convinced American designers are prepared to hold their own against renewed competition of Paris, visiting fashion editors representing the nation's newspapers today whirled dizzily through the fourth day of New York's spring style previews.

Highlights of the showing up to now are Claire McCardell's brief and bare beach clothes, the "wapped-and-tied" effect prominent in all casual clothes, the apparent abundance of pure silk in all the top collections, and the prevalence of full-length elegance for evening.

"Diaper" Shorts

Sensation of the McCardell collection is the "panung," a 1945 shorts. This is a flat single piece version of last season's "diaper" of navy blue jersey which ties around the waistline, is drawn between the legs and ties again around the neck. It represents the ultimate in "bare coverage," is hailed as the dawn of a new theory in clothing.

Other McCardell hits include her gray flannel swim shorts with purple bra tops and matching beach coat; her side-fastened skirts and "Dutch Boy" styles, her matched wardrobes consisting of matching or contrasting shirt, jacket, skirt and "pedal pusher" shorts.

TUNICS AGAIN

Samuel Kass shows a collection notable for feminine flattery and exquisite detail, highlights being simulated tunic dresses in solid color sheers and prints, "apron" fronts on print dresses edged in black and lace and a slim, lady-like look to dressmaker suits.

Pauline Triger accents capes in her suit collection, showing elbow-length ones worn over suit jackets. She presents smoothly rounded shoulders and sleeves with lots of underarm fullness in kimono, cape and kerchief versions.

Capri scores with a new tawny brown called "Forever Amber," used in both dresses and suits, shows life-size artificial flowers tacked on the floating panel of a black crepe dress.
