The Art Of Applauding

By Chaplain Frank M. Thompson

The art of applauding reaches ts climax in some of our great political conventions where for hours organized pandemonium reigns in behalf of the respective presidential candidates.

suddenly from an unseen audience rived. there comes a thunderous burst of handclapping and bravos. The audience is not only unseen, it is not there. The experts behind the can imitate the crying of a baby to a rooting section of an army and navy football game.

True very few broadcasts resort to artificial stimulants and we are not taking issue with those who do. There is nothing quite so depressing than to be greeted by a deep silence when you expected laughter and appreciation. After all, manufactured or mechanical applause is better than none at all. The point is there is a large place in life for the real thing. In fact, most people who come to usefulness, come because in hours of glooms some one has spoken words of encouragement.

We are very prone to take for granted the services of others, especially those who are near and dear to us. They scarcely ever get a "Thank You." Applaud if you will the boy prodigy, but give your own lad a pat on the back now and then. Acclaim the sweet singer who stirs your soul, acclaim also the good housewife who dishes you up an appetizing beef stew. Shout your head off for the winning gridiron team, but remember also to give a few hurrahs for the old man who has been on the gridiron most of his days.
