

AGENCIES HERE TO DISCUSS JOBS

To create more interest among local employers in the "On-the-Job" vocational program as provided for veterans training under the GI Bill of Rights, the Wilmington agencies associated with the administration of veteran affairs yesterday called a meeting of representatives of the U. S. Veterans' administration, U. S. Employment service, and the State Veterans' commission.

The meeting was held in the VA office, Tide Water building, and was attended by Robert Matthews, VA contact representative, Graham K. Cottingham, USES veterans' representative, Leonard W. Barrett, SVC representative, and Howard M. Hinkle, manager of the local USES office.

Contact was made with H. R. Emory and George L. Stearns, chairman and secretary, respectively, of the Central Veterans' Service committee, operating in the community. Plans were made for a meeting of all the agencies heads to be held in the office of the Community Chest Monday, Jan. 7.

At that time plans will be furthered for the promotion of the training program with each member of the committee to be made responsible for contacting a specified number of employers in the area.

Following contacting of the employers of the district, plans call for a mass meeting to be held, possibly the following week, at which time the committee will meet with employers and discuss the vocational training program with them.

Barrett, in explaining the proposed program, said it was the intention of the group to have state representatives of the VA and SVC present to speak to Wilmington and area employers.

Railroads Report Drop In Revenue Freight

TODAY and TOMORROW

by WALTER LIPPMANN

U. N. O.—BEFORE AND AFTER
Any one who would work for peace must have in his own mind some working conception of how peace can be made. He must have an orderly view of some system and pattern which he believes men can take through the complicated maze of the world as they find it in 1946.

So I am venturing to sketch a system and pattern of peacemaking. I make no claims for it except that I have found it useful myself, and that it may be useful to others if only as something they can criticize, refine, or replace. In this sense any general conception, however crude and insufficient, is better than none.

We must recognize, it seems to me, that, first, there are works of pacification which must be done in order that U. N. O. may operate; that, second, there is the work that U. N. O. is designed to do; that, third, there are works that can now be begun and should be developed which look beyond U. N. O.

For convenience we may call these three phases of the peacemaking pacification, international co-operation, and the formation of a world state. But although we must distinguish them in our thinking, we must realize, I believe, that we have to work in all these phases at once. For they overlap and are interrelated.

This will become clearer if before going any further we define concretely each of the three phases.

The work of pacification is concerned with the establishment of lawful and effective government in those large areas of the world where it is wanting. The United Nations Organization has been set up as an association of sovereign and peace-loving states. But in a large part of Europe, and in much of Asia, there were millions of people at the end of the war who had no government which was both sovereign and peace-loving. The Germans had no government at all. The Japanese had a government which we could not treat either as sovereign or peace-loving. The smaller states of eastern Europe and the Balkans, which had been occupied and then liberated, had no more than provisional governments. Italy has only a weak provisional government. China has a legally recognized government but its authority is not recognized by large numbers of Chinese. Even France is still midway between a provisional government and a fully established legitimate government.

In the region of empire over the dependent peoples which extends from the Middle East across India, Burma, Indo-China, the Netherlands Indies, and the Philippines, there is little that can be called settled and accepted government authority.

What I have called the phase of pacification covers the work of establishing reasonably efficient, reliable, legitimate government in all of these lands. They cannot play their part in the United Nations Organization except as they have the benefit of recognized and effective governments. Their misery can be relieved a little, but there can be little more than that in these lands until there are sufficiently effective and acceptable governments to maintain law and order and to administer programs of rehabilitation and reconstruction.

We shall be less confused and discouraged, and more lucid about the immediate issues of the day, if we see clearly that we must pass through the phase of re-establishing government in areas where it has been utterly destroyed or partially undermined by enemy occupation, by our victory, by abdication of the former rulers, by their internal weakness and corruption, and by deep unrest and the desire for something better than what existed before the war.

The United Nations Organization can not and need not wait until this work of pacification has been completed everywhere. Far from it. But it cannot begin until the work is fairly well advanced in enough nations that play a great part in the world. The United Nations Organization needs more than the Big Three. In Europe it certainly needs France, and enough of the smaller states to make Europe itself truly represented.

The immediate mission of U. N. O. is to bind together the nations which do have working governments against the dangers which are inherent in the fact that for a long time to come there will be rich and unsettled regions of the world—particularly in the Middle East and Asia—where authority is in dispute and cannot soon be firmly and legitimately established. The peace-keeping function of U. N. O. is to see to it that the unsettled regions of the world do not become arenas of mortal conflict among the great powers. The strain on its peace-keeping function will diminish only in so far as we succeed in promoting the re-establishment of legitimate government where it is now lacking, and that includes Germany and Japan.

The mission of U. N. O. is, in addition to peace-keeping, to promote the infinite varieties and possibilities of trans-national co-operation which make for well-being and for culture, regardless of military power and national prestige. The greater this work the better will be the environment in which man can do the work of pacification which precedes U. N. O., and the task of peace-keeping which is U. N. O.'s special mission.

There is, then, the third phase, which we have named the formation of a world state. I do not think we can or should now conceive it as calling for the formation of a world legislature and executive. There is much to be done before any foundation exists upon which a world government can be erected. That is the work of creating a supra-national regime of law under which individual persons gradually acquire rights and duties. In my view the apparatus of world government cannot be set up successfully until mankind has become habituated to a regime of world law.

It is not necessary to have a world legislature in order to enact world laws. They can be made by treaties and conventions and by courts. There was a common law before there was a parliament in any recognizable modern form, and in my view the development of a common law of the world, enforceable by national and also by international tribunals, and by public opinion, would be the true beginning of a world state. I would expect the world state to come into being long before there was any such thing as a full world government, elected by all the people of the earth.

In this sense and in this direction we must, I believe, move beyond U. N. O. Just as it is impossible for U. N. O. to operate if we fall in the pacification which must precede it, so U. N. O. will lack soul, purpose, and vitality unless we are working within it, through it, and beyond it, for something greater than U. N. O. That something greater can be nothing less than a world state of law to which all individuals, including the rulers of national states, are subject—under which they have duties, to which they are accountable if you commit world crimes, in which they find added protection for their personal rights as human beings.

Study Of Presidential Succession Proposed

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4.—(AP)—Several Democratic senators today proposed a joint Senate-House committee to study the problem of presidential succession.

They hoped the committee's recommendations would be so exhaustive they would end a growing controversy over who should enter the White House in event of the death of both the president and vice-president. Interest in the succession question rose sharply as result of President Truman's recent airplane trip from Washington to Missouri in stormy weather. At about the same time, Secretary of State James F. Byrnes, next in line for the presidency, was flying back from Moscow.

Mrs. Maudin Requests Order To Retain Son

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 4.—(AP)—A Superior court order prohibiting her husband from taking their two-year-old son from the state is requested by Norman Jean Maudin, 22, estranged wife of cartoonist Bill Maudin. She asserted the artist had threatened to remove the boy, Bruce, and asked support pending trial of Maudin's suit for divorce. Placing her husband's income last year at $200,000, Mrs. Maudin petitioned for $710 monthly.

POW'S TO REMAIN FOR SERVICE HERE

German prisoners will remain here indefinitely, according to Capt. R. H. Hazel, commanding officer of the POW camp here.

There are 305 prisoners now in the local camp, Hazel said yesterday. All of the prisoners are working in sawmills, pulpwood industries and on the farms.

Four contracts have been let with farmers of the Castle Hayne community, Hazel said, for employment of the prisoners in general farm work. A Slagle, John Leeuwenburg, Otto Leeuwenburg and A. Loreck, all farmers in Castle Hayne, have prisoners at work on their farms.

"Contracts are being made only on a day-by-day basis," Hazel said, "because we have no assurances as to how long the prisoners will be here."

Hazel added, "I expect we will be here for several months."

County Agent R. W. Galphin revealed that no pressing need for farm labor exists at the present time. The season is a comparatively slack one for farmers, he said, with the harvesting of winter vegetable crops the biggest item of work.

At the peak of the camp's activity, more than 500 German prisoners were made available to private employers.
