Chapel Hill Folk Now Making Contributions To Koch Memorial

CHAPEL HILL, Feb. 21—To show the folk outside of Chapel Hill just how much the homefolk think of "Proff" Frederick H. Koch and the pioneer work he did at the University in developing the first state-supported theatre in America to be devoted to the development of a native drama, the students and citizens of the University village have put on a local campaign to help raise funds for a new and long needed theatre that is proposed as a memorial to the founder of the famous Carolina Playmakers.

Dr. J. O. Bailey of the English department is chairman of the Chapel Hill committee, and he is being assisted by a number of other Chapel Hill citizens and students.

"The Playmakers outgrew the present theatre long ago; they are now using seven offices, shops, and laboratories scattered in odd nooks all over Chapel Hill," Dr. Bailey says in his appeal for contribution. "We need the theatre to make the best part of 'Proff's' dream come true, a dream of a citizens' theatre here in Chapel Hill, center of the dramatic life of the state, opportunity and laboratory for native playwrights and actors second to none in the country."

Dr. Bailey said that "letters to a few former Playmakers have brought in $5,327 in checks and $1,716 in pledges. Former Playmakers and 'Proff's' friends in the theatres in New York and Hollywood promise to raise a good deal more. But they want us to raise money locally first; they want to know North Carolinians mean business."

"The people in New York and Hollywood will move next, contributing to build for us here. Then we'll ask some people in the state for more; and finally we'll take the record to the legislature, show what we have, and ask for the rest. On the opening night, you'll be proud of the Koch Memorial Theatre and your part in building it."

We, The Women

Appeal To Figures---Not Minds

BY RUTH MILLETT
It's hard to tell whether the have-nots are happier in the case of nylon stockings.

Ruth Millett

There is the sad, sad case of the Los Angeles woman who had 12 pairs of nylons so dear to her heart she had them locked in a safe. But the safe — nylons and all — was stolen and the real owner was back in the ranks of the have-nots.

Not that many women have to worry about more than one pair of nylons. But the worry over a lone pair is perhaps more of a strain than the worry over a dozen.

First there is always the weighty decision, before she goes out for an evening, as to whether or not the occasion is worthy of her one pair of sheer, flattering stockings.

If she decides it is, she is uneasy all evening for fear she'll slip on an icy walk and fall down, tearing out a knee, or that there will be dangerously rough edges on a bridge table chair, or that a runner will pop when she stoops over to retrieve a dropped handkerchief.

If she makes it back home with the precious nylons snag and runner free—she draws a sigh of relief.

IT ISN'T WORTH IT
The girls who still don't own a pair of nylons don't have that kind of miser-like worry to cope with—but they are in the unhappy situation of having to go to parties wearing droopy rayons when some of the women are in flattering nylons. It's the kind of unfair competition that makes a woman's blood boil. It wasn't so bad when everyone was wearing rayons — but being a have-not in take.

So neither side of the fence is a particularly happy one. And now the stocking manufacturers come along with the news that stockings will probably continue to be scarce all through 1946.
