OPA said that because there are no ceiling prices on live lambs or sheep, some meat retailers have been paying excessive prices for these animals, having them custom slaughtered and then selling the meat at above-ceiling prices.

The new program, OPA said, is designed to discourage slaughterers from slaughtering sheep and other animals owners of the difference between the sum of the cost of the animal and the slaughtering fee on the one hand, and the average wholesale price ceiling on the meat obtained.

OPA said that under these circumstances, packers will be reluctant to accept custom slaughter jobs. The agency hopes this will divert supplies to larger packers.

State Project
Governor Cherry said the state was prepared to spend $1,000,000 on the project and build a drydock for use of government, as well as merchant vessels. The funds, he said, would be raised via state port bonds.

Further, present shipyard facilities would be maintained on a stand-by basis for future shipbuilding in case of an emergency. To spend $1,000,000.

"The commissioners sensed our view that with that exchange—the entire yard in return for a drydock, yard maintenance, and a $1,000,000 expenditure—the state would have to pay no money to the commission in the transaction," Broughton said. "Furthermore, the government would save the upkeep cost, which is estimated at $25,000 monthly."

Maritime Commissioners John M. Carmody and Raymond S. McKeogh advised that the proposal be filed formally in writing. Congressman Clark is expected to do so within the next few days.

Majority Leader Barkley (D-Ky) told reporters he would resist any attempt to take up labor legislation until the British Loan and draft extension legislation are out of the way.

John D. Small, civilian production administrator, issued the warning about the emergency coal stocks. His statement did not mean that the nation would run out of soft coal completely in 12 hours. It referred merely to emergency stocks under control of the government. But Small emphasized that the whole situation is critical.

Each month with about 100 men sleeping in the basement quarters on each night of the weekend.

Jesse R. Reynolds, City recreation director, told the group the recreation department was currently furnishing between 150 and 200 girls for dances at Camp Lejeune.

If the USO is abolished and a suitable organization not allocated with the responsibilities, the hostesses now serving would no longer be available in groups for that service, he pointed out.

If an adequate budget were to be made available and the building purchased by the city and turned over to the recreation department those hostesses could be kept available, he said.

In addition the building would be turned over to the servicemen over the weekend affording him some place to go while on liberty in the city, added the director.

During the balance of the week the building would be available for civilian recreation projects, he said.

Major George Webster, Special Service officer at Camp Lejeune, told the group Wilmington recreation officials had cooperated with the recreation activities of the camp and through the furnishing of hostesses had enabled them to continue with weekly dances at the base.

Pointing out that the 9,000 Marines now stationed at the base would be cut almost in half by the middle of June, Major Webster asserted the number would be raised to 20,000 men when a combat unit takes over permanent residence at the base in July.

"These men will be 'liberty-minded' and will want someplace to go," he said.

Asked if the present USO building's closing would stop the issuance of liberty passes by the commanding officer of the base the major replied "not unless the men themselves request it."

agreement, Byrnes was said to have urged that now these should be turned over to the peace conference.

Molotov was said to have disagreed, asserting that the Big Three decision in Moscow required the major powers to draw up complete joint drafts of treaties for submission to the 21-nation conference.

Byrnes had put forth the proposal when the ministers split once again—this time on the question of Italian reparations. It was understood Molotov was wiring his government for instructions, and that Bidault and Bevin were doing likewise.

However, there was little indication here that the Russians would agree. Moscow long has opposed multilateral settlements beyond the major powers.

Byrnes suggested the ministers might meet in Paris three or four days ahead of June 15, to adopt a joint report to the larger meeting, listing points of disagreement.

At this juncture the matter was tabled for the time being. The ministers instructed their deputies to draw up such a list of agreements and disagreements, to be presented to Thursday's session.

Thus, on the first anniversary of common victory in Europe, the Deputy Foreign ministers were put to work on a draft of the major differences among wartime allies. This failure to break the deadlocks on any of the major issues seemed here to foreshadow a makeshift, heavily armed peace rather than the one of harmony upon which a year ago the war-weary world had pinned its hopes.
