Mrs. Arden expressed her happiness that it was over and both Diane and the baby so well. Bill's father held her hand, spoke proper words of congratulation Paula came, kissed her. "I'm glad you're calling the baby for your mother. It's pleased Joe." Diane saw tears in Paula's eyes as there and been in her father's.

Bill came in every evening, tele. phoned to her every morning. But Diane's high moment was when the nurse laid the baby beside her to feed. Then the white-walled room became a cloister, shutting them in together. The first time she had felt some terror at being left alone with so helpless a bit of humanity, but that was soon lost in her joy of possessing it. Soon she dared tighten her arm about it, hold the small hands in hers, cuddle the pink feet, bury her lips against the sweet-smelling golden

The warmth of its body one with ners, the baby would sleep and Diane would lose herself in blissdreaming. No troubled thoughts could touch her now; they belonged to a world outside this she held in the curve of her arm. They belonged to that other self she had been. This self, born with the baby, had nothing to do with them.

It was she thought, one still afternoon, the metamorphis she had expected to happen to her when she married Bill. She smiled, remembering that Paula had said it was good for a girl to have baby because then she had something to think about besides herself. She had Nellie, now. It would be Nellie first, always. She believed she was thinking the baby when Bill again brought up the matter of engag-ing Annie Harkness and she op-

"Annie'd know what to do, as vell as any trained nurse.' With patience Diane marshalled other arguments. "It's very important to keep up the hospital training - Annie's old-fashioned, she'd want to rock Nellie!" "You can tell her not to," said

Bill, as patient as she "Bill, don't think I'm stubborn or just want to have my way! I really feel very firm about this." Firm, because she was thinking of Nellie. "I want to take Miss Tierney home with us. She's that pretty nurse who came in yesterday when you were here. She adores Nellie - says Nellie's the best-behaved baby in the nursery. And it's that training that is so important-" He yielded, but not without say-"If you don't know anything more about her than that she's pretty-we know everything about
