Bowerman Explains Workings Of International Ice Patrol In Atlantic

Commander G. H. Bowerman of the Mendota told the Kiwanis club yesterday about his ships service in the recently-ended annual ice patrol and about the ship itself.

Icebergs, he said, which are a natural phenomenon and as yet beyond man's control, are a grave menace to navigation, but their danger is lessened by the operation of the international patrol and radar. They are chisels from the Greenland icecap, which is some 5,000 feet thick, and are carried at the will of ocean currents until they finally drift sufficiently southward to disintegrate.

The ice patrol, in which 14 nations originally participated, was established after the Titanic disaster in 1912, but was abandoned during the recent war although the United States maintained a considerable force off Greenland throughout the hostilities.

Because of the changed alignment of nations, Commander Bowerman added there will doubtless be a change in the nations participating in the patrol and the expense devolving on the remaining nations.

The Mendota, he said, is but two years old and is the only ship of its sort in the Atlantic. There are three in the Pacific. The balance of this type of ships are in the "stand-by" class.

The Mendota has a five-blade propeller, instead of the customary three or four blades, an arrangement which reduced the vibration, particularly when the ship carried full wartime armament.

It is allowed a crew of 114 men and ten officers but at present is not fully manned. The maximum speed is eighteen and one-half knots and the cruising range 9,000 miles. At 12 knots, the Mendota may remain at sea for a month.

It is equipped with air conditioning machinery which also provides heat in winter. The engines which does away with the old "telegraph" system.

There are three radars aboard, for sky, surface and fire control. Ten radio transmitters and 13 receivers are in its equipment.

The ship's average monthly expenditures, he revealed, are $23,000, including payrolls, supplies, repairs and whatnot.

In the absence of Rex Willis, president of the club, George Conant, vice president presided. Visitors were By, Youngman, Chicago Kiwanian, A. C. Coffey of Asheville, Judge Leo Carr, and W. H. Montgomery.

Chess is mentioned in Hindu literature at least 3000 years before Christ. It was then called "chaturanga."
