Community Bible School Holds Closing Exercises

Mrs. Sarah Boyer, school who was in charge of the exercises, and her staff of 15 teachers were very pleased with the accomplishments of the school. From a total enrollment of 100 children, 50 were awarded perfect attendance certificates, showing that they had not missed a single day of the session.

The school was operated on the departmental pattern. In addition to courses in Bible study courses were offered in music and the Sunday School and Miss Hannah Pitts, teaching by the interest method by the participants in the school. It was obvious that the same type of church school was not only a profitable operation.

N. Y. Age Leaves Harlem, Marks End of Fabulous Era

NEW YORK (AP) — When the New York Age moves from its old location at 230 West 155th st. it will mark the end of an era in Harlem. Once, three powerful Negro publications were located within two blocks of each other on 135th and Seventy Avenue, and the Age.

Twenty years ago, these papers flourished and were bitter rivals. George W. Harris, editor-publisher, owner of the New York News was a staunch Republican. He had served as a city alderman and was high in Republican circles. When the Paterson-McCormick interests decided to establish a daily tabloid in New York City, they offered Harris $20,000 for the name, New York News. Harris refused and from that time his paper began to decline. Originally a full sized paper, it was converted to the tabloid form before Harris lost his paper to Father Divine. Divine had been invited to use the News to publish his weekly sermon before he started his own paper, 'The Day'. Harris lost his political prestige fighting the regular organization and became financially involved with Divine. Then Divine stepped in and took over the News, liquidating the paper entirely.

Meanwhile, the Amsterdam News was having its difficulties under the old administration of Sadie Warren Davis. Strikes put the paper on the rocks, and she sold out to the present owners, the Powell-Savory corporation. The Age, known as 'The Old Lady of 155th Street', had been in the possession of the Moore family ever since Fred P. Moore bought out the controlling interest of the paper founded by T. Thomas Fortune. When Moore edited the paper, he leaned to the Republicans but played 'footsie' with the Democratic administration. At one time, he too was a city alderman. During prohibition, Moore openly published addresses where liquor was being sold. It is believed that his continued pounding away at this laxity resulted in the arrest of three Negro prohibition officials who subsequently were sentenced to penitentiary terms. One was a noted political figure in Harlem. Republican circles as was his wife. Both died recently.

When Moore died, his heirs attempted to keep the dying paper on its feet finally selling to an Englishman, Richard Bourne-Vanneck. With reorganization, Bourne-Vanneck attempted to reorganize the paper, spending large sums trying to make the antiquated printing press function. In this he failed, and outside interests printed the paper. Bourne-Vanneck also became involved financially with the Rockefeller interests and others. When he could not meet his obligations, the paper was sold to the Chicago Defender. Reverting to the old name, New York Age, the Defender plans to abandon the outmoded spot in West 155th Street for more modern offices closer to the new center of Negro activities, West 124th Street. When the Age offices move to its new location, there will be nothing left to remind Harlemites of the days when the Age, the News and the Amsterdam waged relentless battles for supremacy in the Harlem market.
