

Feminine Fashion Flair

A Happy Easter is what every one has and I am sure. Even though most of my chums that is destined to young women, I feel that Easter is really belonging to the small girls. Don't you enjoy watching them on their way to Sunday school, looking at their new dresses, their shiny new shoes and the happy smile on their faces? And how proud they are! Don't forget that just because they're young doesn't mean they're always the same. It's not. They have a few surprises in store for us all.

Riding the crest of the fashion wave of new fashions for teenagers are prints and patterns that differentiate these dresses from seasons past and mark them definitely 1953.

As cottons continue to take place formerly held by satin taffeta for their spring dresses, we paternosters just like there were terms of many types, reds, gold, oranges, even with the uniform colors of traditional checks and stripes formerly shown in every fabric.

The answer seems logical here. Scrambled prints with such a variety of colors and patterns will have to look much more than the march of the marchioness which averages a patterned gown to have been promoted to 1953, and some types that still do. Prints are only distantly related to the "Scrambled" term. Thus the un-motif, though usually in the same color tones, and on similar cotton fabrics, also looks like these new found ones for the new fashions. The color scheme will require a round white and/or black with the other colors.

With synthetic art silk dresses or what have you, the designers will be leading the fashion parade, and you can bet they'll lead it beautifully.

NAPAD designs, like Cleva, are continuing to be a big concern of the season.

It was first invented by the Association of American Dress Designers, Inc., in 1947, and designed and produced in Birmingham, Alabama, for over 10 years. Recently it was sold to Atlanta, and now is based in Houston, Texas.

The designs are tremendous in variety, from the original and unique to the more conventional.

At Alabama's first and second NAPAD shows, the designs had to compete with many others, and separate itself and its own designs after each showing. Last year's collection, however, attracted the attention of its designer, Mrs. Freda S. Henderson.

She had to leave so much of her designs behind, but she talked about them and the class.

Her collection ran the gamut from the daintiest to the bolder and more provocative.

Before a tall house in the sky, Peacock in Atlanta's sky before Easter, he designed everyone with his own designs, which were later to be seen in the Easter Parade.

His designs, though, are much more modest, and though talked about, he has not yet won the class.

He has, however, won the southern title of "most sophisticated."

He has, however, won the south.

Cleva, and if you want to know that you can depend upon tradition,

you can depend upon him.

For instance, his umbrella dress is a very simple halter top with a matching belt.

His skirt, which was

He has a tucked dragon effect on the hemline.

It is a truly dramatic effect.

It has attracted the designers.

Tommy, however, looks very handsome for young Miss Cleva.

He has done the NAPAD designs.

He is equally adept in techniques of silver details, interesting vests, pockets, and button facings, all suited to the versatility of the designs. His question always is, "What's next?"

We are very happy to salute a young man who has turned into a true artist, often thought of as a genius.

WORLD WAR II

Tommy eats just about half as much as he did a few months ago,"

a worried mother told the doctor.

"Nothing I give him suits him—not even things he used to be crazy about!"

The physician examined Tommy—a sturdy fifteen-month-old. Nothing wrong with Tommy physically. Then why the lack of appetite?

After the baby's first birthday, there's often a letup in appetite, according to Dr. Otto A. Faust, Pediatric Consultant to the Beech-Nut Packing Company. Between one and two, the baby's rate of growth—and weight gain—slow down and so does his interest in food. He's apt to get picky and choosy—and eat only half or two-thirds as much as he did. He may demand many servings of one food but spurn all others. Possibly he'll skip a meal or two entirely.

What should a mother do if these things happen?

Dr. Faust suggests: Be ready to offer smaller servings the first time your baby eats with his dinner. A big plateful of food looks most unattractive when you're not hungry.

Don't insist that he eat any certain food—or eat "just one more bite" when he obviously doesn't want it.

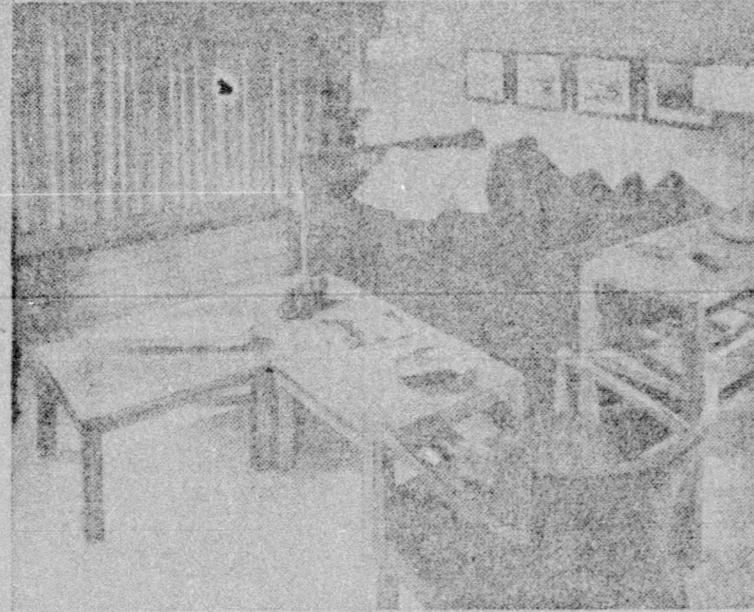

"More feeding troubles start in the second year of a baby's life than at any other time," says Dr. Faust. "But the more easy-going and understanding a mother can manage to be about her one-year-old's appetite slowdown, the less likely that any fasting feeding problems will come of it."
