YOU ARE THE DETECTIVE Three days ago, the payroll cash—about $22,000—of the Garland Machine Tool Company was robbed. Two masked men, wearing sun glasses and wide-brimmed felt hats puled low ever their faces, had entered the treasurer's office soon after the money had been delivered by armored car from the bank, and had not only made off with the money, but had forced Wilford J. Kenton, the treasurer, at gun point to accompany them in their getaway car.

Not a single clue has been uncovered until this morning, when police officer Tom Parsons, while cruising a short distance out of town, was hailed by a man wearing a dirty, wrinkled suit trudging towards town, and then recognized him as the missing Garland Company treasurer, Kenton. After phoning his news into headquarters Parsons yielded to Kenton's pleas to drive him by his apartment so that he could clean up before talking with the police authorities. According to Parsons, it hadn't taken Kenton very long to wash his hands and face and then don a fresh shirt and clean suit. Kenton is well-known as one of the town's sharpest dressers and for being extremely meticulous about his grooming. Kenton is now telling you his story. After he had been abducted by the two robbers, they had taken him about four miles out of town and had tied him up in the dark cold and damp cellar of an abandoned farmhouse. A flush suffuses Kenton's otherwise pale, smooth face as he relates his harrowing tale. He tells you of the long ho he spent alone, worrying about his eventual fate at the hands of the two men, of their jeers whenever they visited him in his dark "cell," and of the meager bis of food they left him. From the sound heard on the floor above him, he judged they spent most of their time playing gin rummy . . . and then finally he had heard the sounds of their departure and had after some arduous work managed to free himself of his bonds and escaped 'Would you be able to identify these men if you saw them again?'

"Not from their appearance," he replies. "I might from the sound The undersigned having qualified as indicated as diministrator of the estate of ESTHER of their voices.
