YOU ARE THE DETECTIVE

The body of the gray-haired stock broker, Melvin Manners, lies on the thick carpet of his sumptuously furnished office, a bullet hole in his chest.

"A pure case of self-defense," exclaims his young junior partner, Jim Layton. "We were struggling for possession of the gun you see lying on the floor next to him . . . suddenly it went off. He had a terrible uncontrollable temper . . . everyone knows that . . . but I certainly never dreamed that he would ever try to use a gun on me." He pulls a large, white handkerchief from his pocket, mops the perspiration from his brow, and shakes his head mournfully.

"Let's have the entire story, from the beginning," you prompt him.

"Well, Mr. Manners had been especially angry and peevish toward me for the last couple of days . . . claimed that I had been taking too much credit for some of our recent business successes . . . kept reminding me that this was his business, that it had been built on his name and by his efforts, and that no 'upstart' like me was going to take over. I tried my best to soothe him down, telling him I was just trying to do my best for the company and that certainly I was not in any way attempting to compete with him for any of the business. But despite all I could say or do, he still persisted in needling me and making sarcastic remarks about 'the boy wonder.' This morning he was worse than ever . . . seemed to be working himself into a terrific rage. I had just about reached my limit of patience with him, and had walked away from him in an effort to regain some measure of control over myself."

"I was standing over there at the window, conscious of the feel of the sun shining through the window on my face, but trying to summon up the right words to reason with him . . . when suddenly he was advancing on me with that gun in his hand! I immediately wheeled around and grappled with him . . . I got a hold on his gun hand and in the ensuing struggle for possession of the gun it went off . . . and he fell to the floor . . . dead!"

You stop over and pick up the gun with your handkerchief, noting the smudges of fingerprint on the weapon.

"You'll find both of our fingerprints on that, of course," mentions Jim Layton.

"Oh, I'm sure of that," you agree with a nod. "But I think Melvin Manners' prints have been planted on the gun. You told a pretty good story, but not quite good enough!"

What has made you suspect Jim Layton's story?

SOLUTION

If the sun had been shining through the window on Jim Layton's face, as he told you, then he could not possibly have seen any reflection on the glass from behind him.

again tried to attack the officers.

rants were signed against him, but was soon subdued and war-charging assault with a deadly weapon and resisting arrest.

SLAPS VISITOR, GETS WHIPPED

James Hinton, of 1725 Poole Road, told Officer H. K. Martin at 11:50 p.m. Saturday, that Leamon Evans came over to his house about 9:45 p.m. and paid him a dollar he owed him.

Later, Hinton stated, they started arguing. Both men agreed that Hinton slapped Evans and then Evans started to leave the house, but picked up a board or a large stick instead and hit Hinton on the left side of his head, opening up a 4 inch gash on the top of his head. He was treated by Dr. W. F. Clark, E. Cabarrus Street.

Leamon Evans, who lives at 1306 Pender Street, was arrested and placed in Wake County Jail under a $200 bond, as a result of a warrant signed by Hinton, charging assault with a deadly weapon.

DOM OF WORSHIP. WITNESSES

Reports have come out of Portugal and its overseas provinces of Angola telling of violent persecution of non-Catholic minorities, especially Jehovah's Witnesses. Private homes of Jehovah's Witnesses have been invaded by the police simply because they were peacefully studying the Bible. Many have been jailed.

The Portuguese Post Office has also taken measures to suppress the circulation of the Bible in Portugal. Large quantities of Bibles and Bible literature belonging to this group have been seized and cut up and burned, and thousands of subscribers to the Watchtower and Awake! magazines have been denied the right to receive their magazines through the mail.

It is reported in the May 22 issue of Awake! that when acts of terrorism broke out in Portugal's overseas province of Angola in Southwest Africa early in 1961, the Roman Catholic Church took a leading hand in accusing the witnesses of being involved in those acts of violence against Portuguese officials there. This misrepresentation through false propaganda by the Catholic Church in Angola stirred up persecution in Portugal itself and caused the work of the witnesses in Portugal to be interfered with. Members of the group were followed by the secret police, picked up and arrested, questioned, beaten, and accused of being communists. Ironically, the witnesses are banned in communist lands and have to carry on their work "Underground."

The latest information from Portugal tells of continued suppression of religious freedom. On March 12, when forty-five members of the Amadora, Lisbon, Congregation of Jehovah's Witnesses were gathered together, their assembly for worship was disrupted by twelve policemen. The meeting was stopped, all the women present were ordered to go home, and the male members of the congregation were arrested and taken to jail. The three ministers who were on the platform when the police arrived have been detained in prison indefinitely.
