

DEAR SALLY

BY SALLY SHAW
DEAR SALLY: I'm a man of 39 with a wonderful wife and three fine children. I'm facing a dental operation soon involving a number of tooth extractions, and I'm worried sick about this—and not because of any possible pain, because I know I can take that. What I can't take is the prospect of the anesthesia accompanying this operation. My lovely wife, devoted to me as she is, insists that she be with me during the whole thing, holding my hand. What I'm fearful of is the possibility that I'll talk while I'm under the anesthetic and maybe blurt out some of my lurid past, things I did before I met my wife and of which she has no knowledge, and that this might disillusion her and maybe wreck the happiness of our marriage. Can you offer me any advice? APPREHENSIVE.

DEAR APPREHENSIVE: Most dentists don't permit any guests during their "operation," and I'm sure you'll have no trouble at all in persuading your dentist to keep your wife in the waiting room until your operation has been completed and you are completely out from under the anesthetic.

DEAR SALLY: My husband has the terrible habit of exaggerating and embroidering the stories he tells to a ridiculous degree. All our friends are aware of this, and it embarrasses me to see them winking at one another while my husband goes on and on with his fantastic fabrications—his financial standing, the "big deal" he's working on at the office, his athletic achievements of the past, and so on. I'm sure everyone regards him as a big "blow-hard," and I can't blame them. In every other way he's the finest of men and the best of husbands. Is there any way I can cure him of this one annoying habit? FIBBER'S WIFE.

DEAR FIBBER'S WIFE: This habit is obviously your man's attempt to gain the spotlight of attention. You'll just have to speak friendly to him, tell him how his wild stories are affecting other people and embarrassing you, and if he's "the finest of men and the best of husbands," as you say, he'll make a big effort to leave his stories down to correct proportions.

DEAR SALLY I'm a girl of 16, and have just begun dating boys. Here's a perplexing problem that keeps coming up. Some of these boys, when they call at my home for tea, seem very uncertain or undecided about what we shall do for the evening's entertainment, and they ask me what I'd like to do. This always poses a problem. Some of the boys, I'm sure, don't have too much money to spend and I'm always hesitant about suggesting anything for fear of its being too expensive. Do you have any suggestions on how I can handle such a situation? TENNER.

DEAR TENNER: Of course, no boy should be asking any girl for a date unless he's sure he can pick up the tab for the entertainment, and especially if he leaves the decision to her. However, your easiest solution is to suggest several different ideas for entertainment representing a variety of price and interest-range. Then turn the decision back to him.

DEAR SALLY: Our daughter has been married for six months to a fine young man, and they live in his hometown which is about 600 miles from us. She writes to us regularly, telling us how "supremely happy" she is, and how kindly and wonderfully her husband's parents have treated her. We haven't yet been able to make the trip to our daughter's new home to visit her, and we have never met our son-in-law's parents or heard from them. However, we are very grateful for the manner in which they have accepted our daughter, and we're wondering if it would be proper to write a letter to this effect to them. MRS. K. H.

DEAR MRS. K. H.: According to the general rules of etiquette, the groom's parents are supposed to have written to you—long before now. However, a nice, warm expression of friendship and gratitude for their kindness to your daughter takes precedence over any rules of etiquette.

UNTIL somebody tells them, half the people don't know that you or your company are important.

THERE'S NOTHING nicer than doing business with a customer who pays his bill with a smile.

IF YOU'RE SORRY to come to the end of the book or see the television program run out of time, you've been well entertained regardless of ratings or best-seller reports.

WHAT HAS BEEN described as a brittle woman is a type of female I don't like.
