

DEAR SALLY

BY SALLY SHAW

DEAR SALLY: I'm a girl of 22, a secretary to a claim adjuster for an insurance company. I was brought up in a home where never a profane word was uttered, nor any kind of vile language. Still and all I'm not a prude. But just the same I shudder at some of the expressions my boss uses in the letters he dictates to me... profanity and sometimes even some downright obscene words. Of course, I realize this is just his manner and he's under the mistaken impression that these words will get his message across better. But it does embarrass me to sit there across from him jotting these blistering words down in shorthand and then later typing them into business letters. The only thing that stops me from quitting this job is the beautiful salary he pays me, and which I'm sure I couldn't even come close to duplicating elsewhere. So, what do you advise? SECRETARY SUE: If you really want to listen to more beautiful language elsewhere, there's nothing at all to prevent your resigning your present position—except that "beautiful salary."

DEAR SALLY: I'm a guy of 26. Recently a good buddy of mine told me he was going to spend an afternoon at the racetrack and so I gave him $30 and told him to put it on some fast horses. That evening I met him and he told me the sad news that all my horses had run out of the money. The next day another friend told me that Friend No. 1 had cleaned up more than $300 during his afternoon at the track. This really threw me. Then, when I asked

Friend No. 1 about it he said, "That's the way the ball bounces. I happened to back the wrong horses with your money, and the right ones with mine." How about this? J.D.K.: I think that for $30 you should have learned a valuable lesson, and be well rid of a not-so-valuable "friend."

DEAR SALLY: Eight of us married gals have been playing bridge together for almost 12 years, and are all very good friends. But now seven of us have heard rumors that the husband of the eighth girl has been running around with a young woman who works in his office. We don't have any downright proof of this, but the sources of our information are pretty reliable and we're all very much distressed about what is apparently going on behind our friend's back. I've been deliberating on whether to tell the girl about her husband's philanderings, but my husband says this is no kind of news for a friend to convey to another, and that we should all keep our noses out of this. What do you think? CONCERNED: DEAR CONCERNED: Your husband's advice is excellent. Follow it.

DEAR SALLY: I have a small portable typewriter which is a great boon to me. I use it to type letters to my friends, cooking recipes, memos, and in fact everything—because my handwriting is atrocious and everyone has trouble deciphering it. However, a friend has just informed me that it isn't socially correct to type letters to friends, that this is considered too "commercial looking." What do you say about this? MRS. T.W.: DEAR MRS. T.W.: Your informant has "misinformed" you. It is perfectly proper nowadays to write social letters on the typewriter. There are some exceptions, however—letters of felicitation, thank-you letters for gifts received, bread-and-butter letters, and letters of condolence are still in better taste if they are handwritten.

NOTE TO G. M. G.: I only hope you're sorry ENOUGH for what you've done with your malicious rumor mongering. If you are, you will go straightway to that girl friend of yours, confess what you did, and hope that she will forgive you. Then go to each person to whom you blabbed the untrue story, each person whom you've heard repeat it, and each person whom you even suspect of having heard it, and tell them all that you lied.

A&T College Releases Its Opening
