In most areas of the United States, autumn is the best time to seed and fertilize lawns. It will pay you handsome dividends next spring and summer.

There are several reasons for this. Many grasses grow better in cool weather, new grass has a head start in spring, and there's no competition with weeds. Also, the soil is not sorry as it usually no competition with weeds. Also, the soil is not soggy as it usually is in spring—making it easier to work with, and shorter days and cooler temperatures make watering and seedling care watering and seedling care simpler. What's more, there are fewer gardening chores to compete with lawn care.

Autumn is the time when plenty of fertilizer should be applied—at least 40 per cent of the year's total. To avoid burning and to stimulate growth, use those fertilizers containing non-burning, slow-release nitrogen. They extend the usefulness of nitrogen during the growing season. Additional applications of fertilizer in autumn are desirable because they build reserves in the soil for a fast start in spring.

You can have a take-care-of-itself laws if you plant the right seed mixture. A good seed mix-ture should contain a high per-centage of permanent grasses, such as Kentucky bluegrass (Windsor), red fescus or the

For new lawns, prepare a good seedbed. Till the soil to a depth of several inches and incorporate organic materials (compost, peat or even sawdust) and fertilizer.

Sow the seed uniformly, coverwith a mulch, and water gently and frequently until the first green sprouts appear. You may leave the mulch to decay and contribute to soil humus.

When planting seed in thinned areas, rake and scratch the soil's surface vigorously. Then sow the seed lightly over the sod and work into the soil.
