The Horse that Pulls the Plow Must Have the Fodder. Austin, Ga., Chronicle.

Senator Vance, of North Carolina, has stated the doctrine, to the victory belongs the spoils, in a quaint, homely way which is peculiarly his own, but which goes home to the understanding of all his hearers, and finds hearty endorsement. "The horse that pulled the plow must have the fodder," was the expressive language in which he clothed the familliar doctrine, and though Senator Vance is being criticised by some of the ultra civil service people, and called the spoils Senator, he has said nothing which is not good politics, and politics which no party is strong enough to disregard.

Mark you, he did not say the horse that did not pull the plow shall be turned out to starve, or shall not have fodder. He only said what the horse who did pull the plow deserved. He leaves the otherhorses to look out for themselves. He is arguing the case of the horse who worked, and who worked where he ought to have worked. He believes, just as the most of other people believe; that the best things should come to those who carried the day, and snatched victory from the entrenched foe. He does not say put them all to the sword and no quarter; he only says look out for our own men first, and then be generous to the enemy.
