DEER HUNT—
 than peddle deer, finally the lot fell on me to make the trip so I hooked up my team and started early next morning. There was a butcher shop at the entrance of the town where I sold one deer, but one was all I could induce him to buy. I drove on through the town and tried at every hotel and camp to sell my deer but without success, finally a boarding house told me if I would cut it up, she would buy a quarter. So I borrowed a butcher knife, drove off to a stable and proceeded to take off the hide and quarter it up in short order while I was doing that the lady had let her neighbors know about it and I sold the other three quarters as soon as I could get them ready, and returned to camp before night. The party remained to hunt had hunters luck and failed to land anything that day, but they found plenty of bear signs and wounded one, but that was all. There is a species of wild cherries that grow on the South foot-hills, which are used for canning and jelly, by the ranchers and the common black bear that climbs is very fond of them and get fat on them. The next morning after my return from the mining camp we all started to the hills early and had not gone far until we came to a wild cherry orchard, where the bear tracks were as plentiful as rabbit tracks in briar fields here in winter time, but the bear are hard to locate as they lie as much concealed as they can in day time in the thickest brush they can find, however not long after we had separated for the hunt I heard a vigorous yell or call which I knew to be my friend Allen and from the tone I decided there was something urgent on hand so I answered him and started as fast as I could well go to find him and learn of his troubles. I soon found him standing about fifty yards from a black object which I recognized as a large black bear. I asked him if he had examined it and he said he had shot it three times but he did not know whether it was dead or not, as he had not been close to it. I told him that I was not afraid of a dead bear and proposed we investigate the matter, and when we examined him we found the last shot had broken his neck, we found on going over the grounds that I had scared the bear out of his head in the thicket, and in running away from me he ran onto Allen who killed him, and I had not seen him. The next thing to do was to "round up" the other boys which we did by a call which we all understood, we were then about two miles from camp, as soon as we could one man returned to camp after two horses and saddles to pack the meat to camp we had to cut the bear in halves and pack one half on each horse, we succeeded.
