who fore joining the side of the South, had been a clerk in the Department the Interior, said he was going the back to Washington and find out something detunte. He left armed with two words in Cul. Jordon's ciph-원관 er. "Trust hearer," and was told to report to Mrs. Rose Greenhow. She said he was sent in answer to her prayer, for she was in desperate a need of a messenger. She hastily wrote her important note. "Orders issued for McLtowell to move on Manossas tonight," and she gave it to Donuellan whom she sent in a buggy in relays of horses down the eastern shore of the Potomac to a ferry where he could cross. Cavalry couriers delivered the note to General Beauregard that night, July 16. The next day she had word, "Lot them come; we are ready for them." The way she got her information was, she 림 managed to get a copy of the order issued to McDowell.

It was during these trying days

When the War Department recovered from the effect of Bull Run, it at once began to locate where the steady and swift flowing stream of information to Richmond had its beginning. Suspicion at once fell on Rose. But she would not leave her U post of duty, although she was oblig-ed to have realized the danger. Day after day she waited to be arrested, sending all the news she could gather to her friends across the river
