But at a time like this, when the approaching election is a topic of conversation on all sides, it is apparent that the organization which brings to the public spot news reports of the trend of political thinking in the country is performing a public service."

A small army of statistical workers is employed to tabulate the Lit-erary Digest returns as fast as they are received, after which the figures are broken down to show not only the vote as it is forecast for next November, but also the manner which the individual voted in the last presidential eleciton, Mr. Hodges xplained.

Thus listeners to the Goodyear broadcast over 64 NBC stations hear not only last-minute fgiures on the poll, but also interpretations of significant changes in key sections of the country.'
