

Washington News

Washington, D. C.—The most perplexing angle concerning the current effort of the Supreme Court to impose its views on the authorities in Little Rock is the attitude of President Eisenhower. There is no doubt that the President is disgusted with some of the pressure groups who would forcibly integrate everyone, everywhere at once.

There is doubt whether the President disagrees with the 1954 Supreme Court decision on segregation in the schools. Certainly he has never availed himself of the opportunity to back up that decision, and as Chief of Staff of the Army he favored, and testified for, segregation. On the other hand, he used troops when advised to do so to implement the court decision and has often said he is duty-bound to uphold the law of the land. And he has said he thought the court decision was the law of the land.

Meanwhile, he has admitted he said to friends that integration should be slowed. But he has also denied having told friends he wished the court never had rendered its now-famous decision. So round and round it goes, and just where he stands nobody knows.

Adding further to the puzzle is the fact that on the day after the President told a news conference—he might have told friends integration should be slowed, the Justice Department presented an all-out plea for speeded integration. Yet the President had told a reporter his views were not far from those of his underlings in the Justice Department and that if they ever became too far separated, the reporter could draw his own conclusions as to what would happen.

Nothing has happened; no one has been removed from office, and no indication of any sympathy for a slowing down of integration has been indicated by the Justice Department. So the puzzle merely deepens.

Orval Faubus, Washington officials are learning, dies very hard indeed. Those who thought they had him licked when troops were dispatched to Little Rock have been disturbed by the obvious popular support of the people he has received in Arkansas. And now Faubus has said he would close Central High if the court orders it integrated. He still maintains he has the authority to preserve order and peace in his state (which he undoubtedly does) and that integration at Central would cause bloodshed (on which point the argument really centers). There appears no opening for the federal government here.

It is just possible that Faubus has maneuvered the federal government, Army and Supreme Court into a box. At least it is beginning to look that way.

The big question in Washington concerning the Far East is how far the communists will go in their attempt to shift the world spotlight from Lebanon to Formosa. The latest word from Moscow—that the Russians will back up China in any fight for the offshore island—sounds very grave.

No one seems to know—not even Americans—what President Eisenhower will do if U. S. forces get involved in a clash. The burden rests squarely and uneasily on Mr. Eisenhower's shoulders.

Adlai Stevenson, meanwhile, has returned from Russia and a conference with Nikita Khrushchev, and has suggested that it might be a good idea to show the Russia leader American's charms. Maybe it would be a good idea, Stevenson says, in that the Russian leader is willing to talk, hopeful for better U. S.-U. S. R. relations, etc.

The Administration has shown no indication that it is considering any invitation to the Russian leader, who has hinted on several occasions that he would like to visit the U. S. A. It may be that all hope of a Summit meeting is not lost, however, for there is still some speculation about such a meeting—even though little progress has been realized and though Khrushchev has lost what opportunity he was afforded to act as the prosecutor at a special meeting primarily concerned with Lebanon and Jordan.

Many Seeking Farm Limestone

Many farmers are now filing requests for limestone to be used on land where seeding or improvement practices will be carried out next spring.

Every spring a lot of farmers are held up in carrying out their practices on account of late lime deliveries. Experience has proven that all the necessary limestone cannot be delivered in the short time necessary for spring seeding.

Farmers who can possibly use lime this fall should call at the ASC office and file their requests before November 19.
