Garden Time

(By M. E. GARDNER)

I have been having trouble with "Actinopelte" on a very large Southern Red Oak. This is a fungus disease which causes leaf spotting and results in rather severe defoliation. The disease attacks the lower leaves first and gradually works upward. The pathologists tell me that it may be controlled by spraying but special equipment is required to cover a tree so large. They do give a word of encouragement by saying that the disease seems to work in cycles and is more severe during murky weather in late spring and early summer.

Remember that anything which interferes with the normal functioning of the leaves of a plant will reduce food manufacture and may result in death if not corrected.

Two cases of camellia canker, or die-back, have just come to my attention. This is the most common disease of camellias. The first symptom is a wilting of the leaves followed by the formation of cankers on the stems. Terminal twigs may be killed.

To control the disease, cut away and destroy all dying twigs and small branches. For cankers on large branches, cut out the diseased portion and apply an anti-septic paint to prevent re-entrance of the fungus and promote healing of the tissues. This disease is usually more severe on plants that have been heavily fertilized, especially with nitrogen. Recent investigations suggest that a protective spray of Ferbam may help in control. If you wish to try this, use six level tablespoons to five gallons of water plus a good wetting agent. It seems that the best time to apply this protective spray is just before and during the period of leaf fall.
