Doctor Talk

By JOHN B. REMBERT

Many readers will think this writer "old fashioned" after reading this column dealing with infant feeding, because many will disagree with the opinions expressed here. These opinions, whether the reader agrees or disagrees, should be expressed and discussed often. This writer admits that advancement in science is necessary—but only when this advancement is of benefit to all concerned. The scientific advancements made in artificial feeding have developed to a reasonably satisfactory state—that is in this writer's opinion for the benefit of the busy modern mother, but not necessarily for the benefit of the infant. Regardless of how busy the modern mother may be—and if she is truly as busy as so many claim, then this writer questions the wisdom of motherhood in these individuals—she should make every reasonable effort to breast-feed her infant.

Nature has done a good job of providing most mothers with the facilities for feeding their infants—this they should do without hesitation—breastfeeding being denied the infant only if medically contraindicated. The advantages of breastfeeding are numerous, such as: (1) sterility; (2) satisfactory emotional experience; (3) composition of breast milk; (4) the ease of digestion of breast milk; (5) the constancy of the milk constituents; and (6) the probability of the transfer of immune bodies from the mother to the infant.

Mother's milk is completely safe with sterility never a problem—artificial formulas using cow's milk or evaporated milk are constantly in danger of becoming contaminated because of refrigeration required and the use of utensils for preparation. Psychologically the mother and her new infant must become adjusted to one another. Mothers breastfeeding their infants derive satisfaction from the feedings and the fact that it is impossible to nurse the infant without holding him closely provides him with the sense of security which is so necessary early in life.

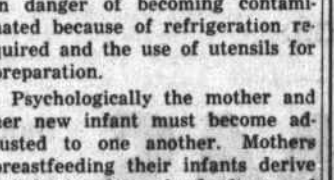

The ease of digestibility of human milk to any other milk for the infant is agreed to by all authorities.

ties. Cow's milk often causes discomfort and digestive disturbances. The protein concentration in human milk is low and its structure results in very little casein, whereas, in cow's milk the casein content is 3 to 4 times greater. This difference in proteins results in the curd formation in human milk being small and friable, while in cow's milk it is large and tough. The chief disadvantage to breastfeeding from the mother's standpoint is her loss of figure. Whether or not the mother nurses her infant, the breasts involute sooner or later after each pregnancy. Another argument against breastfeeding is that it is time consuming and necessitates the curtailment of many outside activities—but mothers should remember that this close and intimate association with the mother in the early weeks of life is of the greatest importance to the emotional security of the infant—so this is time well spent.
