What is meant when we say winds flow out of high into lows? What effect does this flow have on the weather? A high pressure area simply means that the layer of gases above us (the weather) is very high. Therefore its weight, which is the barometer measures, is great. Actually, we are under a high pressure system. When the barometer records a low reading the weather layer above is a comparative valley. So the air on a mountain goes through a constant process of flowing into the lower areas. Because of coriolis force, or the earth's spinning, this flow into the valley is counter-clockwise in the northern hemisphere. This flowing and turning is actually wind, and when the flow is swift enough we have high wind or a storm. Thus a low pressure area usually means bad weather, and wind, since the valley above is filling up—so to speak.
