If you would win success, keep your word. Don't be hasty in making promises, but once you make an important promise keep it, though the heavens fall. Establish a reputation of being a person of your word. Let folks know that when you say a thing, you mean it.

If you promise to meet someone at 9 o'clock, see that you are there at that hour. Don't consider it a mistake if you should reach there at five minutes of nine. Better to go without your dinner than to be ten minutes late.

Never give people the impression that you say one thing, and do something else. Nothing so surely blasts a reputation for 100 per cent sincerity as that. People wish to deal with integrity, not with duplicity.

If a note is due on a certain day, pay that note even if you have to borrow the money to do it, or renew the note, or at least visit your creditor and have an understanding.

If you have promised to perform some service, be sure the service is performed, or that the effort is put forth. If the one you have promised to serve forgets it, see that you don't forget it, if memory fails you, invest ten cents in a writing pad and carry it with you and use that pad.

One whose word is as good as one's note is the one whose note is good. He who will not keep an oral promise would break a written agreement. A foolish promise should not be made, but if the promise is made, it ought to be kept.

He who makes light of a small promise will ignore the larger promises of life. We want to deal with the person whom we know is absolutely sound through and through.

We want to know that he is genuine and that he will keep his word. We fear, we shun, we ignore the two-faced person. If we detect that quality in others, they will detect it in us.

Success never comes to him who is unreliable, who thinks nothing of breaking a pledge. Failure marks the path of the one who does not possess honor enough to keep his word.

Written agreements should not be necessary, but they are, because of the human element of infidelity. People rightly judge us by the way we keep our word. They expect us to make our acts square with our promises; our conduct with our professions. We should be what we pretend to be.
