Spray Raspberries To Control Disease

Immediate attention given raspberry fields as soon as the crop has been harvested will increase the yield and the profit next year, says H. R. Niswonger, extension horticulturist at State College.

One of the main points, he says, is to keep the new canes from dying of leaf spot disease as many did last year.

Remove and burn all old canes at once. Then spray the new growth with either a home-made or a commercial Bordeaux mixture so as to cover all parts of the plant thoroughly, he adds. Spray again three weeks later and again in another three weeks.

To make 12 gallons of Bordeaux mixture, he points out, put 10 gallons of water in a wooden tub or barrel. Add two ounces of soap flakes or chips and stir until dissolved.

Stir into the soapy water one pound of powdered bluestone until it dissolves. Add one pound of hydrated lime in a paste mixture or sift the dry lime through a strainer while stirring the water vigorously. Then add enough water to make 12 gallons of the solution.

Smaller or larger amounts of the mixture may be made in the same proportion, Niswonger points out. A 50-gallon barrel is a convenient vessel in which to mix the larger amounts.

Be sure to keep the raspberry patches cultivated frequently to stimulate the growth of the new canes and to keep weeds and grass out of the field, Niswonger urges.
