Legion Puts Finishing Touches To Program

(Continued from Page One) now to render a distinct service by encouraging young men who get in the toils of the law," he said. "We should lend a helping hand and try to encourage boys who get in trouble, for just a word may work wonders in reclaiming a boy and making out of him a good citizen."

The speaker said that there is a big opportunity in maintaining a moral standard for teen-age boys and girls and a problem which cannot wait until the war is won. He also told his hearers that boys now fighting will look to first World War veterans for leadership and constructive thinking, for the United States will play an important role in mapping the course of world events.

"For about five years after the war ends, to my way of thinking," he said, "America will have an opportunity to render the greatest service any nation has ever had, and we must be outspoken, tactful, willing to see the other fellow's side in a give and take manner."

Judge Carr urged the Legionnaires to become as well informed as possible about post-war plans. He said that after the war there will be two schools of thought, either national or international. If the former prevails, he said an opportunity will be lost to render the greatest service to the world, but that if an international viewpoint is taken and America is thought of as a leader, then we will be able to make some progress in eliminating force to maintain peace in the world.

In closing his remarks, he appealed to the Legionnaires to adopt the international viewpoint for in so doing will be found the proper course to pursue in behalf of the boys who will be coming back, but whose minds will for a time be befuddled and confused, and who will need a following who know what America ought to do.
