

Many Of Chowan's Farmers Now Seed Permanent Pastures

Pastures Established to Graze Hogs and Stop Erosion

Many farmers of Chowan County have seeded permanent pastures in the last few weeks. Most of the pastures have been established for hog grazing. Kentucky 31 fescue and Ladino clover were used most generally. Orchard grass was substituted for fescue on the better drained sites. Quite a number of these pasture seedings will control soil erosion. Fay Ward, Ernest Boyce, Carroll Byrum and William B. Shepard have located their pastures on fields that needed the protection of broadcast cover. Lots of other fields which were somewhat wet for row crops have been put to good use with these Kentucky fescue - Ladino pastures.

R. H. Hollowell, a member of the Chowan County Board of Soil Conservation Supervisors and a farmer of the Small's Cross Roads section, has recently seeded a three-acre plot to a new cover crop known as Caley or Wild Winter Peas. This is a winter hardy legume which produces large yields of seed.

Wild winter peas have been used principally as a grazing crop and for hay. In the Black Belt of Alabama and Mississippi it has been pastured from late December until May. It is palatable and cattle have made satisfactory gains on it. This legume also is a good soil-improving crop in rotations. Mr. Hollowell will try it out for this purpose. The seed for planting his three acres were furnished by the Soil Conservation Service.

Louis Francis is making good use of another legume—Crotalaria—to build his soils. Mr. Francis planted this summer legume broadcast on a newly-cleared sandy field on his Tip-Toe road farm. He plans to let the seed crop mature so that volunteer crops of soil-improving Crotalaria can continue to come each year and build his soil fertility. Some other soil conservation farmers who are using Crotalaria for soil building purposes are Woodrow Lowe, Mrs. W. A. Nixon, R. O. Blanchard, Charlie Small and R. C. Holland.

Lloyd Bunch, chairman of the Albemarle Soil Conservation District Supervisors and farmer of the Briall section of Chowan County, plans to take better care of an eroding field area on Pollock Swamp. He will retire this area from row-crop production. Sericea lepedeza and Kentucky fescue will be broadcast to check the sheet and gully erosion which has been taking place. Mr. Bunch says, "I want to stop this field washing before it gets too bad."
