

Dramatic Tenth Season Scenes From The Lost Colony On Roanoke Island

Paul Green's symphonic drama, The Lost Colony, which is America's longest running summer theatrical production, is being shown in Waterside Theatre on Roanoke Island, N. C., for its tenth season this year. The photos of this layout were made by Roger Meekins, North Carolina State College student and native of Manteo where he is on the staff of The Coastland Times during his vacation periods. The scenes of his layout show from left to right, top row: Simon Fernando portrayed by Hal Shadwell of Chapel Hill and Columbia, S. C., making efforts to discourage the English colonists who plan to establish a settlement in the New World; Eleanor Dare, played by Barbara Edwards Griffith, Troy, N. C., consoling mad Margery Harvie played by Mary Long of Raleigh; Mrs. Ray Lewis and Mary Mann Evans in upper right are Roanoke Islanders who play parts of colonist women. Mrs. Evans has been a member of the cast since the show's premiere in 1937. Left center shows War-

Pulpwood Industry Replants 61,500 Trees

For the second consecutive year the Southern pulpwood industry is responsible for having planted in excess of 60 million trees. The survey, made by H. J. Malsberger, Forester for the Southern Pulpwood Conservation Association, for the first time included the tree planting activities of those supplying pulpwood to the mills. These pulpwood producers account for the planting of 1 1/2 million trees. The acreage planted is estimated on the basis of setting out 1,000 trees per acre. The industry purchased 5 1/2 million trees from the state forest nurseries and grew the remaining 8 million in company operated nurseries. Nearly 43 1/2 million of these trees were planted on lands owned by the pulp mills or producers. The remaining 18 million were contributed to small landowners to assist them in restocking worn out or idle farm and forest lands. The contribution to the landowner is an increase of 6 1/2 million trees over the quantity donated by the industry last year. Of the total so contributed the producers accounted for about 3/4 of a million trees or about half the total they purchased and grew. The tree planting program of the pulpwood industry is only one of its activities directed toward growing more trees in the South. Through the Southern Pulpwood Conservation Association, adequate forest fire control, wise cutting practices, and educational activities such as the forestry training camps for farm youth, are encouraged and promoted in order to provide a stable economy based on forest products.
