

Six N. C. Governors Appointed Senators

Question Raised Following Alton Lennon's Appointment

How many times have the Governors of North Carolina been called upon to appoint a United States Senator? The recent appointment of Senator Alton Lennon of Wilmington raised that question.

The answer: Six times. And three of the appointments have been necessary since late in 1947 when Senator Josiah W. Bailey died in office.

The first appointment occurred in 1858 when Senator Asa Biggs of Williamston resigned to accept appointment as a Federal Judge. He was succeeded by Thomas L. Clingham of Huntsville.

The next instance occurred in 1894, when Senator Zebulon B. Vance died and Thomas J. Jarvis was appointed to succeed him. Oddly enough, Jarvis had succeeded Vance once before. Vance, according to the records, was elected to the Senate by the North Carolina Legislature while he was in the middle of a term as Governor. Vance resigned the governorship and Lieutenant Governor Jarvis became Governor.

Thirty-six years passed and Senator Lee S. Overman died in office in 1930. Cameron Morrison was appointed to succeed Overman.

Then came the death of Bailey in 1947 and the appointment of William B. Umstead. Senator J. Melville Broughton died in 1949 and was succeeded by Dr. Frank P. Graham. The appointment of Senator Lennon, following the death of Senator Willis Smith, rounds out the list.
