

Keeping Cool In Hot Summer Days Cinch For Men On Ice Cake

Shivering Scientists In Greenland Doing Research Work

Thule, Greenland—U. S. soldiers are cooling their heels on a chunk of ice 8,000 feet thick while the rest of us swelter in summer's heat.

At a time when many scorched souls rise up to wield a wicked ice pick, these men are intent on chipping a hole 120 feet deep in the ice cap they call home.

Shivering scientists living alongside these Army engineers say that at this 120-foot depth they will have reached the estimated level of the snow in 1912. At this level they hope to find ashes from the volcanic eruption in the Valley of 10,000 Smokes in Alaska that year.

This party, scheduled to spend a cool summer on the ice cap, also has another project. The group of 20 Army engineers and 25 civilian scientists is studying the character, density and temperature of the snow to determine the feasibility of constructing roads and airfields using snow as a construction material.

The ice cap party is but one segment of the special Arctic task force now operating within a 150-mile radius of Thule on research and development projects.

The other group, composed of approximately 59 officers and enlisted men and 25 civilian scientists, is working around the shore area to determine ways and means of building satisfactory roads across the boulder fields. The boulder fields are all around the frigid island and were formed by the depositing and abrasive action of retreating glaciers.

Collectively known as the First Engineer Arctic Task Force, the group includes physicists, meteorologists, geologists and crystallographers.

Some of the agencies represented are the Engineer Research and Development Laboratories, Fort Belvoir, Va.; the Snow, Ice and Permafrost Research Establishment, Wilmette, Ill.; the Waterways Experimentation Station, Vicksburg, Miss.; the Arctic Construction Frost Effects Laboratory, Boston, Mass.; and the Ohio River Development Laboratories, Cincinnati, Ohio.

University personnel, both faculty and graduate students from Northwestern, Minnesota and Tufts College also are with the task force. The United States Geological Survey has a representative present.

The task force will return to Fort Belvoir in October.
