SUN LAMPS FOR HENS

The importance to poultry of the "sunshine vitamin" was dramatized recently in tests with sun lamps. Common 20-watt sun lamps with aluminum reflectors were installed approximately 4 feet above feeders for eight hours a day. Hens on a ration that was practically devoid of Vitamin D gained as well and utilized their feed as efficiently as did hens fed rations containing carefully prescribed amounts of the vitamin. It may not be practical to use sun lamps in the average poultry house, but the test proves a point.

Fire Prevention Week

October 3-9 will mark the 35th annual observance of Fire Prevention Week throughout the nation. During that week public attention will be directed to the ever-increasing need for greater fire safety and protection.

Again, as in previous years, the National Board of Fire Underwriters is calling on communities everywhere to engage actively in this campaign.

Individual community activities are most effective when they are directed through local fire safety committees responsible for the week-long campaign. Such committees usually are composed of municipal officials and representatives of fire departments, civic and educational groups, schools, churches, the fire protection and public business, and various other public service organizations of the insur-untary agencies. These committees usually extend their activities to include other year-round fire prevention campaigns, such as Spring Clean-Up and Christmas Fire Prevention, as well as other fire prevention and fire safety programs.

Farmers May Catch Many Animal Diseases

Sick and ailing animals on the farm are a menace—not only to profitable farm management but often also to the people in charge.

Veterinary medical authorities say about 80 infectious and parasitic diseases may be communicated from animals to man. Farmers may be exposed to about 15 or 20 of these diseases. Topping the list is brucellosis which has been called the greatest occupational disease of the farmer.

Other diseases listed included rabies, swine erysipelas, anthrax, hookworm, ringworm, trichinosis, Newcastle disease, tularemia, tuberculosis, leptospirosis and psittacosis.

Prompt diagnosis of ailing animals will alert the farmer so he can take protective measures against infection. Good sanitary practices, such as washing the hands before and after handling sick animals, and wearing rubber which can be removed or washing one's shoes after working in infected pens will also cut down the spread of diseases from animal to man and to other stock on the farm.

It Could Be

A New Englander was enjoying the wonder of California as pointed out by a native.

"What beautiful grapefruit," exclaimed the easterner as they passed a citrus orchard.

"Grapefruit!" replied the native sneeringly, "Why they are just small lemons."

Gazing at some huge sunflowers the visitor asked, "And what are those enormous blossoms in that big field?"

"Just dandelions," the native replied disinterestedly.

A few minutes later they came to the Los Angeles river. "Ah," said the Yankee, "I see someone's radiator is leaking."
