something infinitely lovely, he meant it to be a type or model of the Christian life throughout. He meant that all things may be done in some measure after this pattern, that the lowest things may be touched with the same glory."

There have been, and are, great differences of opinion about this ordinance, churches differing in their viewpoints. The significance of such controversies, says Dr. Lynn H. Hough, "lay in the difference between religion and magic and religion as an ethical experience. If you view the sacrament as the bearer of miraculous grace through physical means the whole conception of religion is inevitably lowered. If you view the Lord's Supper as a spiritual opportunity of meeting a living

Lord in ethical relationships, the most sacred sanctions of religion are conserved. We should not think more of the sacrament than of the Lord of the sacrament, and it is most important that the sacrament be viewed as the instrument of ethical relationship and not as the substitute for it."

The Lord's Supper is a means of grace to all sincere Christians, honestly repentant of their misdeeds and consciously desirous of living better in the future, more in keeping with the ideals and teachings of Jesus. One does not have to be perfect to approach the sacred table. "Many persons fear that their conscious unworthiness makes them unfit to approach it," says Prof. Charles R. Erdman. "All should believe that however great their faults, they are welcome to this table if they come with true repentance and with a desire for holiness." No human being, partaking of this ceremony in this reverent spirit, can fail to gain a new inspiration for a higher life and to leave with a stronger determination to make religious ideals actualities in life.

The individual's participation should be conducive to an honest self-examination, an appraisal of life, its responsibilities, and how well they are being met. Thoughts of gratitude and thankfulness for the never-failing love and all-embracing mercy of God should kindle an effective desire to become more worthy. Remembering the great gift to mankind, one should seek opportunities of service, whereby appreciation would take tangible forms of expression. Reflecting upon the perfect life commemorated and the high ideals of conduct it exemplified, one should realize defects and imperfections, resolving to improve them, in the hope of more nearly approaching the divine standard of living.

A quiet and reverent administration of the Lord's Supper is necessary for the participant to experience these spiritual benefits. Unless the heart is completely cold and callous, remembering the sacrifice of Christ will strengthen one's faith, quicken one's gratitude and move one to good works.
