As a result of studies on resected lungs, such as Archie's, conducted by the research department of the North Carolina System, better treatment methods, more timely surgery and more lasting recoveries from TB can be expected in the future. SPORTS AFIELD

By Ted Kesting

The farther South you go the larger the bass you catch will be, promises Jason Lucas, Angling Editor of Sports-Afield Magazine. They reach their maximum size in the Gulf states. The world record bass, 22 1/4 pounds, was caught in Georgia.

The reason southern bass attain about twice the size of the northern is simple enough: The mild winters down there permit them to feed actively and grow rapidly all year, while in the North they grow only during the comparatively brief summers. But how about the persistent claim that Southern bass are sluggish and put up a poor fight when compared to their northern brothers? Lucas says that he regards southern bass as better game fish than the northern.

This because they will take surface lure far more consistently; indeed, most local anglers down South seem never to use anything else for them. And a bass hooked on the surface nearly always fights near the surface, breaking water often.

Have they the stamina, the long-fighting qualities of the northern bass? Perhaps not size for size. But, remember, they don't run size for size, so the average southern bass will give a longer fight than the average northern bass.

As to the accusation that they are potbellied: All old bass anywhere are inclined to be more or less potbellied, but age for age, the southern bass are no more so than the northern, though his much larger size may make his corpulence more noticeable.

In short, Lucas says that he regards the often-heard remarks about the poor game qualities of the southern bass are pure hooey, repeated only by those who know nothing about them. And very many northern anglers seem to agree with him judging from the growing numbers that go down South for bass.
