get it for her," he exclaimed. "By what method?" The little professor was silent a few moments. Then he looked up. "We will have her sing for the people of this city, and get five hundred people to come, at a dollar each. Five hundred dollars would be a nest-egg; and she could earn enough more by her singing, while a student, to meet her expenses."

Mr. Sax and a group of his friends went to work. They engaged the ballroom of a leading hotel and put signs in the store windows; and they added much face-to-face publicity.

When the appointed evening drew near, some weeks later, the chief sponsor was optimistic. But when the hour for the recital arrived his hopes had faded. Instead of five hundred there were scarcely half that many people who had come. Angeline's voice was as beautiful as ever, and the applause was enthusiastic. But Carol M. Sax's heart was heavy. He sat through most of the program like a man pondering some deep problem. Then, as the end of the recital drew near, his face suddenly lighted up.

The sponsors gathered round him afterwards, out of Angeline's

he serenely replied. "But how . . . ?" they exclaimed as they stared in astonishment. "Don't ask me," he smilingly replied, as though he were puzzled around him felt, after a moment's reflection, that he knew perfectly well what the explanation was.

Angeline went off that fall to a large church college. After four years she graduated and became minister of music in a leading church in a southern city. There she met and married a lawyer, now a prominent judge. She is still singing, in the city of her adoption and elsewhere.

A friend of bygone days met her at a huge church convention where her voice had just inspired thousands. In the course of the conversation he asked a question. "Do you ever think of Mr. Sax?" She did not answer the question. She did more. "Oh," she exclaimed, "what an angel!" So her story is not the story of one angel, but of two.

And it might be debated which of the two derived more happiness from that incident of other days—the one who sang, or the one who, making a girl's bright dream come true, brought angelic joy to a human heart.

WHEN ANGELS MET

By JOHN D. McCREADY

Editor's Note: This is one of a series of articles written by John D. McCreedy, head of the English Department at Chowan College. Mr. McCreedy for 18 years was pastor of the First Baptist Church at Morganton and served as army chaplain in World War II and was state chaplain for the American Legion. Since connected with Chowan College, Mr. McCreedy has preached at many churches in this area.

"If I could only go to college!" Angeline kept saying to herself, as the train sped onward toward her destination.

Like thousands of young people, this eighteen-year-old girl had a burning ambition for a higher education. But, as in many such cases, financial difficulties stood squarely in the way. She had a rich contralto voice, and she felt that four years of college, coupled with thorough voice training, would fit her for life. She was using her talent meanwhile as a gift from God. She was on her way at the moment to sing at evangelistic services. But she was thinking wistfully of her dream—forever beautiful and forever unfulfilled.

The second night of the services an instructor from the state university was present and invited her to sing at the weekly assembly of the student body.

It was an exciting moment for the young soloist as she stood before an audience of two thousand; and the enthusiastic applause that followed each number gave her spirits a real lift. When she and the instructor who had brought her left the platform, a number of faculty members approached. Among them was Professor Sax, head of the art department.

"May I meet the young lady who has just lived up to her name—by singing like an angel?" he asked.

"Certainly—and you must come and have lunch with us."

Carol M. Sax was a small man with a big heart; a bachelor, and rich. His cordial manner was the sign of his warm heart. He was never so happy as when bringing happiness to others. He listened with absorbed interest to all that Angeline said. Afterwards he had a brief conference with his fellow faculty members. He learned of the obstacles in the way of her ambition.
