QUATRAIN
A tree is like a mortal life,
Its glory comes and goes.
It suffers hardships, misery, strife,
And doing so, it grows.
—Shirley Twiddy

The majesty and dignity of a tree has always been a favorite theme of poets. There is no fonder memory of childhood than Longfellow's famous poem, "The Village Blacksmith," which begins "Under a spreading chestnut tree—" And then, there is the poem — "Woodman, woodman, spare that tree—" And finally, there is that all-time classic poem of Joyce Kilmer, beginning, "I think that I shall never see a poem as lovely as a tree—" Literature is replete with poetic and prose references to the tree.

STREET SCENE — Kids with spinning hula hoops. Things like that run in cycles and catch on terrifically, while someone makes a cool penny. Remember Davy Crockett and yo-yos?

FROM THE MOUTHS OF BABES — It appears that my Western attire strikes the small fry in a lot of odd ways. This little fellow wanted to know if I were going to shoot him. He seemed very much concerned that I'd pull a six-gun and start banging away. I told him, No. I only shoot out-poop as lovely as a tree—" Lit-

THE OLD WEST—William Barclay Masterson, familiarly known as "Bat" Masterson, and one of the West's famous lawmen, got his nickname because of his habit of often using his walking stick as a club, or "bat", on the heads of recalcitrant lawbreakers. Masterson was said to prefer his "bat" and never used a gun unless forced to... Boot Hill, the graphic description of a cemetery of the early Western towns, contained some picturesque tombstones... Here's a sample:

No Les no more."
