

SCHOOL AND YOUR CHILD

By John Corey, Appalachian State Teachers College

Last fall Robert Randall, placement director at Appalachian State Teachers College, Boone, N. C., received a letter from the Harford County Board of Education of Bel Air, Md., thanking Appalachian and other North Carolina colleges for furnishing 26 per cent of the system's new teachers this year.

Why is there a shortage of teachers in North Carolina? A report just released by the Harford County Board of Education at Bel Air, Maryland, to Tar Heel colleges may give one indication.

The report states that of the 50 new teachers employed this year by the Maryland school system, 13 of them (26 per cent) came from North Carolina colleges and universities.

Of these 13, three are graduates of Appalachian State Teachers College. Others came from Catawba College, Duke University, Greensboro College, Guilford College, Meredith College, North Carolina State and the University of North Carolina.

Salaries for beginning teachers in the Bel Air, Md., system are $4,300 annually. Maximum salary is $7,700.

Salaries for beginning teachers in North Carolina are $2,946. Maximum salary for teachers is $4,556.

The Bel Air Board of Education in its report expressed its "sincere appreciation" to the colleges of North Carolina. At least 50 per cent of the Tar Heel newspapers printed the story.

Many editorialized to the effect that this is one time North Carolina wanted no thanks and that "it is shameful that such large amounts of public and private funds in North Carolina are devoted to training teachers who promptly go to work in other states because of the larger salaries offered there."

Even though they lamented the situation, the enlightened editors projected hope. The consensus of their remarks:

"Governor-Elect Terry Sanford recognizes this dangerous and expensive loss of North Carolina-trained teachers and promises to use his leadership to get the legislature to do something about it."

"He has tact on his side."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

At some time in our life each of us is confronted with the question, "Who is Jesus?" We shall find much help by listening to the testimony of others. We may read the Gospels. We may listen to the various New Testament writers as they bring their testimony. But, sooner or later, we are brought back to the point of today's lesson. The testimony of another person is not enough. We must give our own answer. We may list many theories, but the most important thing of all is our saying, "This is what Jesus means to me." Sometimes we may discover just what Jesus means to us in strange and unexpected places. A lonely husband, shattered by the death of his wife in a tragic accident started on the road to alcoholism for the sake of companionship. His fellow-drinkers at the local tavern accepted him for what he was, letting him talk his fill, and without preaching at him or judging him for his tendency to drink. One drink inevitably led to another, and before long he was a confirmed alcoholic.

One evening, seeking monetary help from his pastor, he, instead, found himself unburdening himself to the sympathetic pastor's ears, and before he knew it, he had agreed to go with the churchman to a meeting of Alcoholics Anonymous. In AA this troubled man found people who understood him just as well as did the men at the tavern, but who also knew he needed help to regain and maintain sobriety. They gave him unstinted friendship and understanding, asking nothing of him in return except that he try to help himself and also help others who were having the same kind of problem. Ask this man where he found Jesus, and his answer is "In AA."

The deep interest in the inner nature of men is still at work in Christ's name. The transforming power of Jesus reaches people at the point of deep need, and it may happen anywhere. For Jesus is God's infinite love made personal and accessible. Jesus is God's Spirit at work within the lives of those who need him and are aware of their need. Jesus is the symbol of spiritualized living subject to God's will. Just as they did in Biblical times, people are still finding him, today, to be the way, the truth, and the life. And it will continue to be thus for generations to come, so infinite is the power of Jesus Christ.
