

KNOW YOUR SOCIAL SECURITY

John T. Grooms, representative of the Social Security Administration, is in Edenton every Thursday at the North Carolina Employment Security Commission office in the Citizens Bank Building.

Five full years of work covered by social security is enough to qualify a severely disabled worker for cash disability benefits. Mr. John T. Grooms, Field Representative of the local social security office, reminded workers and their families.

The five years of work must be earned in the ten-year period just preceding the onset of the disability, and the disability itself must be of at least six months duration and of sufficient severity that the insured worker is unable to do any kind of substantial work.

Until September of 1960, no disability benefits could be paid to the disabled worker before his fiftieth birthday, but with the enactment of the 1960 amendments this age limit has been removed. Disability benefits for workers under fifty years of age who meet the requirements can begin with the month of November.

Before the enactment of the 1960 amendments, many disabled workers under fifty years of age had taken advantage of a provision to "freeze" their social security records to protect their future benefit rights. These persons will not need to furnish additional evidence of disability, but do need to file an application. Most of them have already received a letter giving them this information.

Mr. Grooms, Field Representative of the Norfolk, Virginia Social Security Office, urges all disabled workers who believe they are eligible under the new law to inquire at the local office promptly if they have not already done so. He also points out that disability benefits are not paid in addition to old-age insurance benefits. Once a worker has reached age sixty-five, disability benefits can no longer be paid. At that age the person receives old-age insurance benefits.

SENATOR Sam Ervin SAYS

Washington—History has dealt harshly with our hopes after two Great Wars. For brief periods after each of them the American people have engaged in great expectations for an easy and enduring peace. In the days of the 19th Century before America became a world power, we relied on others to keep the peace. We entered World War I with a deep feeling that "this was a war to end all wars." In his lifetime Wilson saw this slogan and his dream dashed. In the years after World War II Harry Hopkins said of the Yalta Conference: "We really believed in our hearts that this was the dawn of the new day." We now can see clearly that the day of enduring peace has not arrived. A growing national concern led to a meeting with the President with Khrushchev. It was a somber occasion for the leaders of two nations that were formerly allies. It is no secret that the prestige of the United States is at a low ebb following Laos and Cuba. The more recent breakdown of negotiations over Laos after the Kennedy-Khrushchev meeting shows the almost insurmountable difficulties of dealing with the Russians.

Communist Menace—Difficulties in dealing with Russia have been invariably present since the Communists took power in 1917. They were ever present during our brief alliance with the Soviets during World War II, and they have continued increasing since World War II. Our recent defeat in Cuba and the frustrations we have suffered in dealing with Laos have become the greatest concern of the American people. Foreign policy must be conducted by the Executive Branch of the Government, but it is becoming more and more evident that the United States must conceive an over-all strategy that will mobilize our aims, our defenses, and our national purpose in dealing with the Communist menace. The struggle we are engaged in has no easy solution for every action we take is viewed by all the world, and Khrushchev has been highly successful since the Hungarian Revolt. The late Alben Barkley had an expression which fits the times. He used to say we find ourselves "between a rock and a hard place."

It has become apparent too that it is impossible for the United States to support the entire world, to defend every community in the world, and to maintain a sound economy at home. The nations of the world need to be told in clear language that our resources are not unlimited, and that while we have an obligation to maintain the peace, the obligation upon the other free countries of the world is just as great.
