No Comment

By JAMES W. DOUTHAT
Assistant Vice President, Government Relations Division of the National Association of Manufacturers

NO COMMENT is a report of incidents on the national scale, and does not necessarily reflect NAM policy or position.

Washington — The powerful House Appropriations Committee found a way—just before Congress quit—to halt "back door financing" in spite of Senate votes for it.

The method is to apply a limitation to an appropriation bill.

True, the method is good for one year only. But two major results flowed from this victory of the House committee.

First, "back door financing" on important programs was killed for the year life of the appropriation bill. Secondly, it assures that this issue—one of the greatest confronting Congress—will raise again next year.

"Back door financing" is a term applied to legislation in which Congress authorizes a government agency to borrow directly from the Treasury instead of depending on an appropriation.

The plan is urged by bureaucrats because it permits long-term financing of projects. It is objected to by the House Appropriations Committee because it deprives that committee of an annual review of the program and work of the agency.

There also is a constitutional issue involved. Some members point out that the Constitution provides that no money shall be spent except through an appropriation made by Congress. They argue that "back door financing" violates the spirit, if not the letter, of the basic character of the nation.

What the House Appropriations Committee forced through Congress—at about 4:15 A. M., September 26—was this: A billion-dollar supplemental appropriation bill was under consideration.

Differences between Senate and House were settled in a Senate-House conference.

The conference report, which became law, provided that "back door financing" could not be used in connection with four programs. This was done although Congress previously had authorized this method of financing.

The four programs were: Area Redevelopment, Low Rent Housing programs, Mass Transportation grants, and grants for Acquisition of Open-Space Land near cities.

The situation precipitated verbal fireworks in Congress.

Advocates of "back door financing" contended that the coup of the House Appropriations Committee in the waning hours of Congress was an insult to the Senate.

Some Senators said it was a violation of the rules.

But the House passed the bill after an adjournment resolution had passed, and the Senate was forced to accept the bill or let it die.

In the bill, provision was made for some—but not all—funds sought for the four programs. And the "back door financing" provision applies only to the bill.

Next winter opponents of "back door financing" will make an effort to affix "riders" to appropriation bills which will kill this method for another year.

Opponents of "back door financing" say that if the method becomes prevalent, all the usual checks on bureaucratic spending through Appropriation Committee reviews will be gone, and expenditures will soar to astronomical heights.
