The Roundup

The American people should not be forced to tolerate such breaches of the public interest as the recent transit bus strike in New York City. Some way should be quickly found to mediate or resolve these massive traffic impasses that would be acceptable to all concerned. There was a time in the growth of this country when the people had to take summary action to alleviate intolerable situations, but we have come a long way since the days of vigilantes and inefficient law enforcement, and leave such problems to the law and the courts. In my opinion, the weak link in the whole business has been the law and the courts; stronger action against the strikers and the unions should have been taken. We should not be forced to tolerate the gross and flagrant crime against the people of New York that we have just been witnessing.

STRICTLY PERSONAL—No body ever loved dogs more than I. I have owned several, and there was almost a human relationship between my canine friends and me. But when one has been viciously attacked at one time by man's best friend, and a couple of neighborhood mongrels have taken up residence under my house, and bay at the moon outside my window, even on dark nights, then what love I once bore the canine tribe is stretched a wee bit thin.

WEATHER REPORT—As I write this, it is a bone-chilling (for me) thirty-five degrees outside and about ten degrees higher than when I first looked at my thermometer. It seems that we are in the grip of Winter's first cold onslaught. I have a four-foot picture of an Hawaiian scene, depicting a blue lagoon, tropical skies and palm trees, on my wall. Every once in a while I glance at it and draw a wistful sigh, and a vicarious warmth of zephyr-like breezes and balmy airs flow over me. You see, as the song writer said, I have my love to keep me warm.
