The use of salt to melt ice and snow on highways, walks and drives seems to be more widely used now than ever before. This winter many cities and towns are making every effort to protect trees and shrubs from injury caused by the melting ice which carries the salt solution to the root system. Salt injury is causing wide-spread concern, according to Dr. Philip L. Rusden of the Bartlett Tree Laboratories.

In the New England states damage has been especially severe on roadside sugar maples. In that area, mechanical barriers are being employed to carry the salt water away from the trees, thus preventing seepage to the roots of the plants.

In many areas of the country intensified use of salt is causing injury to nearby trees and shrubs. Both common salt (sodium chloride) and calcium chloride are both toxic to plants, in heavy concentrations, and may kill them in a very short time. In lesser salt concentration solutions the roots die more slowly. The leaves may exhibit a scorched appearance, usually along the margins, and the terminals may die back causing a rather scorched appearance throughout the tree. When these symptoms are noted, it is usually too late to do anything to save the trees.

Perhaps the most noticeable injury to street and roadside trees and shrubs occurs near school and commercial bus stops and along low-lying areas of the highways. Shallow rooted trees such as dogwood and maples are harmed first.

Homeowners often do extensive damage to trees, shrubs and grass along walks and drives by over-use of salt in any form. Signs of browned leaves and retarded growth, that are characteristic of salt injury, are frequently mistaken for some other type of injury, so don't compound your problems.

The use of coarse sand or ashes on sidewalks and drives is far safer than the use of salt and not much more trouble, if you make preparations ahead of the coming of rough weather.

You might try mixing sawdust with enough water to form a wet mash. Broadcast this over the surface and let it freeze. When tracked in the house, it would be easier to vacuum than either sand or ashes.

IN THE DARKNESS

By MARY LIZZIE LANE

In the lonely midnight hours
You can hear the owls hooting.
Then you'll feel cold and shivery,
When you hear the hunters shooting.

Then you'll begin to turn and wonder
As the fox begins to bark.
And then you'll really know the difference
From the daylight and the dark.

The winter nights are long and blustery,
And the midnight darkness is all around.
Sometimes we may feel our weakness,
Just brace up, there's new hope to be found.

When we know the day's work is over,
And then we'll settle down to rest.
We should be content and humble
Because we know that we are blessed.

The long and cold winter nights
When everything will seem so still.
That's when I will read and write,
Until my hungry soul is filled.

In the thickness of the midnight hour,
When you are dreaming of the past,
You'll awake and then you'll know
That it was a dream and could not last.

And then your eyes will open wide,
You'll review then the dream you had.
And you'll remember the by-gone days,
Then you'll feel so awfully sad.

In the morning we can hear the rooster crowing,
And the sound will echo in our ears.
We all should be very grateful,
We've been spared throughout the years.

Two Accidents Are Investigated

The Edenton Police Department investigated two accidents over the weekend involving four cars. Total damages of $340 were estimated to the cars.

On Saturday, Debra Dianne Johnson, 18, of Edenton, was driving a 1966 Ford and Joseph Walker, Jr., 19, of Creswell, was driving a 1968 Chevrolet. Miss Johnson was traveling south on Broad Street when Walker, attempting to back his car out of a parking space allegedly hit the Chevrolet in the right front side.

Patrolman McCoy Parker, investigating officer, charged Walker with failure to see movement could be made in safety. Damages of $150 was estimated to the Ford and $25 to the Chevrolet.

Also on Saturday, Walter Ellis Norman, 18, of Creswell, was driving a 1970 Dodge and Rita Diane Flowers, 18, of Portsmouth, Va., was driving a 1969 Ford. Norman was parked in Hardee's parking lot when Miss Flowers allegedly backed her car into the Dodge. Investigation officer Patrolman G. W. Mizelle charged Miss Flowers with hit and run property damage and estimated damages of $115 to the Dodge and $50 to the Ford.

"You'd think he invented safety."
