

Ecological Delay in Fuel Crisis Recommended by MacGregor

The energy crisis will force some readjustment in our timetable for achieving maximum conservation and improvement in the environment,

Citing proposed legislation which would prohibit surface mining where the Federal government owns the mineral rights, but not the surface rights, Mr. MacGregor said that, if this proposal is adopted, it would seriously restrict the mining of the reserves of low sulphur coal in the western states.

He said that the National Coal Association has estimated that something like 37.5 billion tons of low sulphur surface coal would become unavailable. "We have translated the coal tonnage involved into measurements of equivalent energy in barrels of oil. It represents 166 billion barrels of oil or, to bring this even closer to home, it represents 415 times the amount of oil we are now importing annually from the Arab countries," he explained.

Last year more than half of the nation's coal production came from surface mining. He stated that delays in federal leasing of western coal reserves stem from ecological and environmental considerations forced upon administrators and legislators.

Mr. MacGregor said that the Wyoming coal reserves are equivalent in energy to almost 50 per cent more than the total remaining oil reserves in the continental 48 states.

"Recognizing the legitimate concern for reclamation, the feasibility have to be examined in proper perspective," he added. "Coal seams in the west are as much as 10 to 20 times thicker than in the east. As a consequence, substantially less acreage needs to be disturbed to mine any given tonnage of coal. In addition, greater reclamation cost per acre can be justified without seriously impairing the economics of mining. Production of 250 million tons per year of coal in the West would only disturb about 2,500 acres of land per year, and on a temporary basis. This is less than half of the acreage of land permanently destroyed each year for highway construction in the state of Wyoming alone.

"National environmental policies must consider at one time not only the availability and cost of pollution control methods, but also its impact on the cost of energy," Mr. MacGregor said.

New Study Launched On Litter Control

A comprehensive research program designed to develop a new systems approach to litter control was announced at the 20th Anniversary meeting of Keep America Beautiful, Inc., in New York City.

KAB has contracted with Scientific Resources, of Morristown, N. J., and its Human Resources Institute to design the new research program.

Roger W. Powers, executive vice president of Keep America Beautiful said that, for the first time, "all factors involved in litter prevention will be studied simultaneously and this project will bring together on a coordinated basis community and scientific skills with the force of citizen awareness and action.

"Chief factor to be studied will be the human behavioral aspects of littering," he added. "But the project will also seek answers in the physical and situational areas of collection and disposal, street sweeping and law enforcement practices relating to littering."

Consumers Need to Know

by LEE LANDIS

One of the fallacies we live by, according to the American Economic Foundation, is that economic controls can cure inflation. But there's an old Chinese proverb which states, "He who rides a tiger dismounts at his own peril." In other words, it's easier to start than to stop. And that's true with government controls.

Most controls are urged by special interest groups who pressure the government into selective economic programs. But historically, controls have never worked. It's like trying to move a single marble in a jar full of marbles. Each leans on the other.

Every economic action brings on reaction followed by still other reactions. For example, we sold too much grain to Russia last year. That created a domestic shortage which drove up the cost of feed for cattle and chickens which were under price controls.

With reduced profits in sight, ranchers cut back production. This in turn put price pressure on pork and fish which were not controlled. Thus, the marbles moves and moved to no one's benefit.

The simple cure for shortages and high prices is to permit the law of supply and demand to work. In a free economy it doesn't take long for suppliers to enter a market where profits are available.

The most unchangeable factor in economics is human nature. Man is profit oriented. When denied the freedom to earn as much as possible, man's performance is reduced. But when allowed to develop his maximum income, he can often work economic miracles.

Unfortunately, making the world better for someone else but not yourself is hardly conducive to great effort. It's also difficult for a politician to tell people who are chafing under high prices that the solution is to let prices become temporarily higher.
