Popular Evangelist To Appear Here

By Beth Macklin
 World Religion Editor

Doug Mobley, who gave up the board chairmanship of the National Bank of Commerce to heed God's call to the healing ministry, held his first public meeting January 24, 1977, and admitted his faith wasn't great enough.

His reference was to his choice of the assembly hall at the Tulsa Assembly Center for the meeting. The room, which seats 1,500, wasn't large enough.

Mobley will appear at John A. Holmes High School Auditorium for one service at 7:30 P.M. March 16.

Admission is free.

Mobley, who was unable to find a chair, had to stand in the wings for about an hour before he was introduced, and then was obliged to climb over the front wall of the stage to reach the lectern.

Among the first statements he made to an estimated 2,000 in attendance was that he had seen the assembly center manager and arranged to change the location of his Feb. 20 meeting from the assembly hall to the 9,000-seat arena.

The service started 30 minutes late while ushers opened the balcony, and then the area behind the stage in an effort to accommodate the crowd.

Many still were standing when the service began, but the former banker held the interest of the group for more than two hours. Many claimed the added dividend of healing.

Scores fell backward "under the power of the Spirit," as Tulsans had seen at services conducted by the late Kathryn Kuhlman, when Mobley prayed for them.

Ushers were on hand to catch them, as they had been at the Kuhlman meetings. At Sunday's services, they also placed small sheets over the legs of women who fell, many of whom were attired in short skirts.

Mobley ministered to nearly 400 men, women and children, many of whom came away in tears. Others were smiling and repeating, "Praise the Lord."

Mobley talked briefly with each person who came, then placed his hands on either side of their head and prayed, "Jesus, touch and heal my sister!" or, in the case of men, "my brother."

Much thinner than when he announced two weeks ago he would undertake the healing ministry at what he said was God's command, Mobley shed his jacket after he had prayed for about the first hundred. Aides used one of the sheets to mop his face as he continued to pray for people on cots, in wheel chairs and on foot and he paused for brief sips from a paper cup of water brought by his wife, Donna.

The 41-year-old ex-banker had not fasted before the service, as some evangelists do, Mrs. Mobley said in a brief interview, "But he has lost so much weight just from trying to deal with the
