

Churches To Continue Fight

RALEIGH — The N.C. Court of Appeals ruled against the state's church-affiliated schools September 19 in their fight not to file annual required operational reports with the State Board of Education. However, spokesmen said the fight will be carried to the State Supreme Court and some may face jail terms.

The appeals court has refused to bar the state from requiring the 63 fundamentalist schools — including Immanuel Christian School in Edenton — to file the reports.

The reports are due in mid-October. They are required by the state for use in licensing the private schools.

Rev. Kermit Kelly of Southern Pines, a spokesman for the Christian schools, said the schools would not file the reports despite the appeals court ruling.

"It sounds like the only choice we have, Mr. Kelly said. 'It's either that (a Supreme Court order) or going to jail,' he was quoted by the Associated Press as saying.

Last week, Rev. Ashby Browder of the Immanuel Christian School in Edenton indicated that he was prepared to suffer the extreme consequences (of going to jail) rather than bend to the policies of the state.
