

Work And The Family

Work and the family
When mother begins employment outside the home, instead of changing roles, she simply adds an additional one. Implementation of a "dual role or women" just isn't possible when both roles are full-time jobs. You can't add a 40-hour work week to another's schedule and expect past performance levels on all things.

Sometimes mother's extra income can be used to hire some jobs done. But, if her main purpose in working is to add to the family income, little if any money may be available to hire help. So mother tries to do both jobs. The round-the-clock battle to carry out each role often leaves her physically worn out and mentally depressed. It's at this point that guilt feelings begin and the "I'm - a - failure" complex emerges. The solution to the problem is highly individual. It's something each family must work out for itself. There's no universal "right" answer. Some families may find success in dealing with the problem by discarding their notions of "woman's work" and "man's work" and simply viewing jobs as jobs to be done.

"Mother has always done it" or "father has always done it" really aren't valid reasons for those individuals continuing to do what they've done in the past. A shuffling - or trading - of responsibilities is often necessary. But there's no prescribed "best" way.

The children may benefit when their mother is happily employed. As the quantity of time the mother spends with her family decreases, the quality - or how the time is used - may increase as she strives to compensate for her absence during the day. Realizing that family time is more limited, the working mother often makes a special effort for the family when she is home. She may cook father his favorite meal. She may set aside a special time for each child. Family outings are planned. As a result, the employed mother may be involved in more activities with her children than a mother who is always home.

Research shows that children of employed mothers may be more self-reliant or responsible as they accept - partly through necessity - more serious household tasks than their peers whose mothers stay home. Daughters of employed mothers appear to be more work-oriented than those whose mothers are not paid employees.

Working mothers who previously had a "tied-down" feeling often are happier with combining outside employment with their maternal role. When employed, these mothers may be less nervous or irritated by their children.

Jaycettes Plan Grocery Raffle

The Edenton Jaycettes met at Mrs. Boswell's Restaurant for their monthly meeting July 2, with 12 members present.

Guest speaker was Terry Wackelin of the Arts Council.

There will be an officers training school to be held July 17-19 at Meredith College in Raleigh.

Leigh Ambrose reported on Yard Sale and Bake Sale that was held June 20. She also reported on July 4th parade in which some were to be clowns.

Gail Forehand discussed ways and means project. It was voted on to have grocery raffle. The drawing will be July 31.

The surest way to drive safely is to do nothing else at the same time.
