financial planning

Financial Planning Is...What?
 Everybody does financial planning. You may not think so but regardless of your level of income or the amount of your accumulated assets, you are doing financial planning. Some people do their own planning very well; others need assistance.

For people with limited resources, financial planning may simply be an effective program for living within their means. For others it can involve a number of financial transactions including, but not limited to, the following:

- Determining your cash needs for current spending, retirement spending and, if appropriate, a gifting program to children or charities.
- Preparing an annual listing of all assets and debts to measure the growth in your net worth.
- Arranging your investments, with consideration for your income tax bracket, to provide the appropriate amount of "income" investments vs "growth" investments.
- Monitoring and changing your investment program to counter the erosion of inflation.
- Evaluating insurance requirements at least annually to determine that coverage for all types of insurance is adequate without being excessive.
- Giving consideration to income tax planning as well as estate and gift tax considerations on all major financial transactions.
- Monitoring investments to determine that the after-tax return meets your retirement objectives. An extra 2% or 3% return on your investment accumulates to a considerable amount over a 20 or 30 year period.

Good financial planning is often a team effort. Seek professional assistance.
