TV Program Provides Teaching Tool

"Reading Rainbow," "Ready Or Not," "Voyage of the Mimi," "Give and Take." These programs and some 90 others are part of School Television sponsored by the North Carolina Department of Public Instruction (DPI).

Each day in schools across North Carolina, teachers supplement the educational diet of their students with this instructional television. Approximately 50 percent of teachers statewide find School Television as instrumental as workbooks or computers.

The Edenton-Chowan school system uses these aids to education on a regular basis, according to Director of Instruction Maxine Britt.

Mrs. Britt said that the programs come from two sources. NCDPI has a regional center in Williamston that maintains a cassette library of programs where duplicate cassettes can be made for local schools.

Also available are broadcasts on the public television system which are taped locally. Schedules are received from NCDPI at the beginning of the school year to aid teachers in selection of course supplements.

Using this valuable resource is the focus of "A Different Kind of Television," airing Thursday, Sept. 3, at 7:30 p.m., over the 10 channels of The University of North Carolina Center for Public Television.

School Television consists of 94 instructional series correlated to curricula in the arts, communication, health and safety, math, nutrition, science, social studies and vocational education. "A Different Kind of Television" chronicles their implementation in the classroom and includes reactions from students, teachers and administrators.

location at five of North Carolina's public schools. Used by teachers at the various levels from kindergarten through high school, School Television creates a new dimension in teaching. "A Different Kind of Television" offers the general public a glimpse of the importance of instructional television in the classroom.
