Chowan College will freeze its tuition, fees for 1999-2000

Dr. Stanley Lott, President of Chowan College, Murfreesboro, NC, has announced that tuition, housing, and activity fees will remain frozen at their current rate through the next academic year.

The timing of Lott's announcement, made before a gathering of trustees, staff, students, parents and friends of the college, was intended to be early enough to help prospective and returning students at the college make firm plans for next year.

Lott cited a long list of innovations and new program offerings that the college has put into place in recent years, including returning to the college's former status as a four-year institution; networking the campus and outfitting it with up-to-date computers and other cutting-edge technological equipment; adding majors in biology and criminal justice, a concentration in environmental science, and minors in communication and drama; increasing the number of faculty; automating the library system; creating the Center for Ethics to bring speakers addressing ethical issues to campus and to foster discussion and exploration of ethical issues; and opening the Continuing Education Regional Technology Center to offer computer training to businesses and community members.

Taking to heart College Board President Donald Stewart's recommendation in his address to the National Press Club earlier this fall, Chowan College has opted to "hold the line on rising prices" to help ease the burden of families whose incomes may not have increased at a rate that kept pace with the rising cost of higher education. Both the College Board and the National Commission on the Cost of Higher Education issued reports in 1998 addressing the fact that college tuition and fees have more than doubled in the last 15 years, while the median family income has increased by only about 12 percent.

"These reports remind us that it's vital to our future as a college for private higher education to remain affordable and accessible to families... We have heard clearly families' concerns about the burden placed on them by annual cost increases," Lott told the crowd.
