INSIGHT INTO EYESIGHT

HOW OLDER DRIVERS SEE

Many older drivers feel constrained when the sun goes down because they can't see well enough to drive at dusk or after. There's a reason: older eyes need more light to see by — whether just reading in a chair or on the road. As the years progress, the driver may have more difficulty shifting from near-vision to distance, differentiating colors or reading signs.

In response to an aging population, the Department of Transportation has recommended easier-to-read signs and better configuration of traffic and left-turn lanes.

What the older driver can do to help: get a stronger eyeglass prescription for night driving than the glasses used during the day; choose frames that don't interfere with side vision, and keep eyeglass lenses absolutely clean so more light comes through. Similarly, they may find it easier to drive at night if the car windshield is not tinted.
