ACCIDENT FACTS

By U. B. Careful

Ronald Hocutt, director of the North Carolina Highway Safety Division, said this week that he would like to make it clear to all North Carolina drivers that he has no authority to "fix" a license revocation than the man in the moon has.

"It's amazing how many people try to get me to help them out when their driver's license has been revoked for drunken driving or some other revocable violation," he said. "Scarcely a day goes by but that some person comes to me personally or tries to reach me through some mutual friend in an attempt to get me to shorten the term of a license revocation, or to lift it completely.

"As a matter of fact, I have absolutely no authority to do anything in connection with revocations outside of routine administration of the terms of the driver's license act of 1935. Under that law, when a driver is convicted of any one of several offenses, including drunken driving and hit-and-run, the court is required to take up his license and forward it to the Highway Safety Division, which in turn is required to send the convicted party a note that his license has been revoked and to hold the license until the revocation period has expired. The division's function is one of routine administrative procedure, and the director can do nothing to help a person who has been convicted of a revocable offense. Even the Governor, who has the power to pardon or parole State prisoners, has no authority to restore a revoked driver's license until the revocation period has run out."

"I wish," Hocutt added, "that every driver in North Carolina would learn this, so I wouldn't be continually pestered to do something about revoked licenses."

Since the driver's license was passed in 1935, the Highway Safety Division has revoked the licenses of more than 30,000 drivers.
